IV. DISTRIBUTION OF WORDS.

The following is an attempt to distribute the words in the English language so as to shew the sources to which they originally belonged. The words selected for the purpose are chiefly those given in large type in the dictionary, to the exclusion of mere derivatives of secondary importance. The English list appears short in proportion, chiefly because it contains a large number of these secondary words, such as helpful, happiness, hearty, and the like.

I have no doubt that, in some cases, the sources have been wrongly assigned, through ignorance. Some indulgence is requested, on account of the difficulty of making the attempt on a scale so comprehensive. The account of some words has been altered, by way of correction. The chief are: abyss, academy, accent, accept, accident, ace, advocate, aery, affray, agnail, agog, alabaster, albatross, alembic, allodial, ambuscade, ambush, anagram, anatomy, apocalypse, apocope, arabesque, archetype, askance, asperity, assay, assort, awe, baffle, bagatelle, balloon, ballot, balm, barouche, basil, bauble (2), beadle, beefeater, beryl, bestead, billion, blame, blaspheme, bouquet, bourn (1), bowline, braze (2), broil (1), broil (2), buffoon, bunion, burly, butler, cape (2), caricature, cassia, catamaran, chap (2), chervil, chicory, chintz, choir, chyme, cinchona, clog, closet, clove (1), cock(1), cockatrice, comb(2), compose, condense, contrive, cotton(1), counterpane (2), crochet, czar, dauphin, delta, depose, diaper, diatribe, dignify, dismay, dispose, dolphin, dome, drag, draggle, dragoon, dribble, drip, engross, entail, excuse, exhilarate, expose, fardel, felon, feud (2), feudal, fief, flatter, flout, fray (2), furnace, furbish, furl, gallias, garment, gloze, grail (2), grapple, grimalkin, groats, hale (2), haul, hobby (1), homicide, hubbub, hypotenuse, impose, ink, iota, irreconcilable, jade (2), laity, martingale, milch, mite (1), morris, orgies, overhaul, parricide (1), pate, penal, petroleum, petrify, piazza, plantain, poll, popinjay, prehistoric, punt (2), raccoon, singe, &c.

V. SELECTED LIST OF EXAMPLES OF SOUND-SHIFTING. AS ILLUSTRATED BY ENGLISH.

On p. 730, I have given the ordinary rules for the sound-shifting of consonants, as exhibited by a comparison of Anglo-Saxon with Latin and Greek. I here give a select list of co-radicate words, i.e. of words ultimately from the same root, which actually illustrate Grimm's law within the compass of the language, owing to the numerous borrowings from Latin and Greek. Probably English is the only language in which such a comparison can be instituted, for which reason the following examples ought to have a peculiar interest. That the words here linked together are really co-radicate, is shewn in the Dictionary, and most of the examples are the merest common-places to the comparative philologist. The number (such as 87, &c.) added after each example refers to the number of the Aryan root as given on pp. 730-746.

1. Gutturals. Latin g becomes English k, often written as c. This k, in the word choose, has become ch; but the A.S. form is cedsan. The old word ake is now written acke, by a popular etymology which wrongly imagines the word to be Greek. In the following examples, the first column contains words of Latin or Greek origin, whilst the second column contains words that are pure English.

VII. LIST OF DOUBLETS.

Doublets are words which, though apparently differing in form, are nevertheless, from an etymological point of view, one and the same, or only differ in some unimportant suffix. Thus aggrieve is from L. aggravare; whilst aggravate, though really from the pp. aggravatus, is nevertheless used as a verb, precisely as aggrieve is used, though the senses of the words have been differentiated. In the following list, each pair of doublets is entered only once, to save space, except in a few remarkable cases, such as cipher, zero. When a pair of doublets is mentioned a second time, it is enclosed within square brackets.

ERRATA AND ADDENDA.

THE following notes and additions contain corrections of printer's errors, corrections of errors of my own, fresh quotations illustrative of the history of certain words, and additional illustrations of etymologies. It will be found that, of a few words, I entirely withdraw or greatly modify the account already given; such words are marked with the symbol [*] at the end of the article in the body of the work. In other cases, I have made but slight alterations, or have found fresh evidence to confirm results that before were (in some cases) doubtful; such words are marked with the symbol +]. I have also added a few words, not mentioned in the body of the work; these are here marked by an asterisk preceding them.

The following list of after-thoughts is, I regret to say, still incomplete, partly from the nature of the case. Fresh evidence is constantly being adduced, and the best that I can do at present is to mention here such things as seem to be most essential. There must still be several corrections needed which, up to the present time, have escaped my notice.

ABACK. I give the M.E. abakke as it stands in the edition? of Gower. Abak is better, answering exactly to A S. onbæc.

ABLUTION. Perhaps French; Cotgrave gives 'Ablution, a vashing away.' However, he does not use the E. word. washing away.

\*ABORIGINES, indigenous inhabitants. (L.) Calling them aborigines and aυτόχθονες; Selden's notes to Drayton's Polyolbion, song 8. - Lat. aborigines, the ancestors of the Romans, the nations which, previous to historical record, drove out the Siculi (Lewis and Short). Coined from Lat. ab origine, where origine is the abl. of Lat. origo; see Origin.  $\beta$ . This phrase is usually interpreted as meaning 'from the beginning;' but Dr. Guest suggests that it means men without origin, 'those who could be traced to no distinct origin, obscure, indigenous, and what might now be called pre-historic races; 'Origines Celticæ, i. 91. Cf. Lat. ab-sonus, dissonant, &c. But Virgil's use of ab origine, Æn i. 372, 642, 753, x. 179, ren-ders this suggestion very doubtful, and I think it should be decisively rejected. Der. aborigin-al.

ABROACH. Set abroach is a translation of the F. mis abroche, as it is written in the Liber Custumarum, p. 304.
*ABS-, prefix. (L.) L. abs; cf. Gk. άψ. See Of.
ABSCOND, l. 4. The root is rather DA than DHA; see List of Roots, no. 143, p. 735, and the note upon it. ABUT. 'The southe hede therof abbuttyth vppon the wey leadyng from,' &c. ; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 52 ; in a will dated 1479. ACACIA. See Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xiii. c. 9, which treats

• of the Egyptian thorne acacia. ACADEMY. Not (F.,-Gk.), but (F.,-L.,-Gk.); as the context shews. The same correction applies to Alabaster, Almond, Amalgam, Anagram, Analogy, Anatomy, Baptize, Cataplasm, Celery, Centre, Chamber, Chimney, Chirurgeon. &c. ; which are unfortunately not marked (within brackets) with sufficient accuracy.

ACCENT. Probably from the French; viz. F. accent, 'an accent ;' Cot. - L. accentum, acc. of accentus, &c.

ACCEPT. Not (L.), but (F.,-L.). From F. accepter, 'to accept; Cot. - L. acceptare, &c. ACCIDENT. Not (L.), but (F., - L.). From F. accident, 'an accident;' Cot. - L. accident-, &c.

ACCOUTRE. I find O.F. acoutrer in the 12th century, which is earlier than any quotation given by Littré. 'Les hardeillons moult bien acoutre Desor son dos,' i.e. he (Renard) arranges the bundles very comfortably upon his back; Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française, 202. 23. ACCRUE. The Anglo-French acru, accrued, pp., occurs in

Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 415; spelt acrue in Life of Edw. Conf.. ed. Luard, 1. 4025. The fut. sing. acrestera occurs in Stat. of the Realm, i. 156, an. 1309. ACHE. The A.S. word is also written ece, A.S. Leechdoms. iii. ACHE. The A.S. word is also written ece, A.S. Leechdoms. iii. 6, 1 19. We may go further, and derive the sb. from the strong verb acan (pt. t. cc, pp. acen), corresponding to the strong M. E. verb aken, already spoken of; we find acap mine eigan = my eyes ache, Ælfric's Gram., ed. Zupitza, p. 216, l. 13 (various reading in footnote). Further, the orig. sense of acan was to drive, urge; it is cognate with Icel aka, to drive, pt. t. ok, pp. ekinn. and with Lat. agere, to drive. From & AG, to drive; see Agent. From the same root are acre and acorn. It follows that any connection between ache and  $\delta \chi_{07}$  is impossible. ACID. We find also F. acide, 'soure;' Cot. But it is more likely that the word was taken directly from Latin, considering its use by Bacon.

ACOLYTE. Not (F.,-Gk.), but rather (F.,-Low L.,-Gk.), though it makes but little difference. The same remark applies to Allegory, Almanac, Anchoret, Apostasy, Apostate, Barge, Bark (1), Calender, Calm, Carbine, Card (1), Carte, Catalogue, Cauterise, Celandine, Chronicle, Clergy, Climacter, Climate, Clinical, &c. But see remark on Bark (1) below.

ADDLED. I have copied the etymology from former dictionaries without sufficient heedfulness. The etymology from A.S. ádl is not right; this word would have passed into a mod. E. odle, with long o. Addle corresponds to M. E. adel, as in the expression adel eye, i.e. addle egg, Öwl and Nightingale, 133. From A.S. adela, mud, Grein, i. I (with a reference to Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, i. 177). Thus the orig. sense of addle, adj., was simply 'muddy,' a sense still retained in prov. E. addle-pool. Stratmann also cites the O. Low G. adele, mud, from the Mittelniederdeutsches Wörterbuch by Schiller and Lübben, Bremen, 1875. Cf. also Lowl. Scotch addle dub, a filthy pool (new ed. of Jamieson); O. Swed. adel, urine of cattle (Ihre); E. Friesic adel, dung, adelig, foul, adelpol, an addle pool (Koolman). Quite distinct from A.S. adl, though Koolman seems to confuse these words, as many others have done.

'Littré makes two O.F. ajuster: 1 = * adjustare, ADJUST. 2 = * adjüstare (both common in Med. Lat.). Mr. H. Nicol in private letter had pointed out that O. Fr. had only ajuster, ajoster = adjuxtare, and that Med. Lat. adjustare was a purely artificial word formed later on Fr. ajuster. Ajuster, later Ajouster, adjouster, gave a M.E. aiust, adjoust common in "adjoust feyth," Fr. adjouster foy. This was already observable to Palsgrave. Fr. adjouster joy. I us was already observed a loth cent. Eng. adjute, to add explained by Dr. Johnson as from Lat. adjutare. In 16th cent. a new Fr. adjuster, ajuster was formed probably from Med. Lat. adjustare, but perhaps from Ital. aggiustare (= adjustare), or even from Fr. a + juste. This English has adopted as adjust.' Note by Dr. Murray, Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880. The result is that my explanation of M. E. aiusten is quite right; but the mod. E. adjust appears to be not the same word, the older word being displaced by a new formation from Lat. iustus.

ADMIRAL. 'Also Amiral, ultimately from Arabic Amir, Emir, Ameer, commander, imperator, cf. amara, to order. In opposition to recent suggestions, he [Dr. Murray] maintained that the final -al was the Arabic article, present in all the Arabic and Turkish titles containing the word, as Amir-al-umrin, Ruler of rulers, Amir al-bahr, commander of the sea. The first instance of such a title is Amir-al-mumūnim, commander of the faithful, assumed by the Caliph Omar, and first mentioned by Eutychius of Alexandria among Christian writers. Christians ignorant of Arabic, hearing Amir-al- as the constant part of all these titles, naturally took it as one word ; it would have been curious if they had done otherwise. But, of course, the countless perversions of the word, Amiralis, Amiralius, Amiraldus, Amiraud, Amirand, amirandi s, amirante, almirante, admirabilis, Admiratus, etc., etc., were attempts of the "sparrow-grass" kind to make the foreign word more familiar or more intelligible. As well known, it was used in Prov., O. Fr., and Eng. for Saracen commender generally, a sense common in all the romances, and still in Caxton. The modern marine sense is due to the Amir-al-buhr, or Ameer of the -ea, created by the Arabs in Sicily, continued by the Christian kings as Admiralius maris, and adopted successively by the Genoese, French, and English under Edw. III as "Amyrel of the Se" (Capprave, or "Ad-myrall of the navy" (Fabyan). But after 1500, when it became obsolete in the general sense, we find "the Admiral" used without " of the Sea" as now. The ad- is well known to be due to popular confusion with admirari; a common title of the Sultans was Admirabilis mundi; and vice versa in English admiral was often used as an adjective = admirable.' Note by Dr. Murray, Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880.

ADVENTURE, 1. 7. The O. F. aventure is derived rather from Low L. adventura, an adventure, a sb. analogous to Lat. sbs. in -tura. Latin abounds with such sbs., ending (nearly always) in -tura or -sura; see a list of some in Roby's Latin Grammar, 3rd ed. pt. i. § 893. Roby describes them as 'Substantives; all feminine, with similar formation to that of the future participle. These words denote employment or result, and may be compared with the names of agents in -tor' I regret that, in the case of a great many words ending in -ure, I have given the derivation as if from the future participle. This is, of course, incorrect, though it makes no real difference as to the form of the word. I must ask the reader to bear this in mind, and apply suitable corrections in the case of similar words, such as Feature, Garniture (s. v. Garnish), Gesture, Judicature, Juncture. To the list of derived words add peradventure.

ADVOWSON. In Anglo French it is spelt avue on, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 77; avoueson, id. 409; avoeson, Stat. of Realm, i. 293, av. 1310.

AERY. The derivation of Low Latin area remains obscure. The word may be described as simply '(F.)', as little more is known about it. Note that Drayton turns aery into a verb. 'And where the phenix airies' [builds her nest]; Muses' Elysium, Nymphal 3.

the phenix airies [builds her nest]; Muses Elysium, Nymphal 3. ÆSTHETIC. Really imitated from German; the G. word being from the Gk. 'His Vorschule der Æsthetik (Introduction to Æsthetics);' Carlyle, Essay on Richter, in Edinb. Rev., June, 1817, p. 183; Essays, i. 8 (pop. edition). Carlyle seems to have used the word here for the first time in English; see Baumgarten's Æsthetica. 1750.

I print Mr, H. Nicol's excellent remarks in full. AFFRAY. Affray (and fray), obs. verb (whence afraid), to frighten; affray (and fray), subst., a quarrel, fight. In this word it is the remoter derivation I have to correct, and the correction is not my own, being due to Prof. G. Paris (Romania, 1878, v. 7, p. 121); the reason of my bringing it forward is that it explains the Mod. Eng. meaning of the substantive. (Parenthetically let me remark that afraid, in spite of its spelling, has not become an adjective, as stated in Mahn's Webster, but remains a participle; it is not used attributively, and it forms its absolute superlative with much, not with very.) The derivation of F. effrayer, to frighten, effroi, fright, given by Diez, and generally accepted, is from a hypothetical Lat. exfrigidare, and this was corroborated by Provençal esfreidar; the original meaning would therefore be "to freeze" or "chill." But, as M. Paris has pointed out, exfrigidüre, though satisfactory as to meaning, is the reverse as to sounds. First, frigidus keeps its d in all its known French derivatives, the loss of the unaccented i, by bringing the g in contact with the d, having (as in roide from rigidum) protected the latter consonant from weakening and subsequent disappearance. This difficulty is met by M. Scheler's proposal of exfrigere instead of ex/rigidare; but this involves the change, unparalleled in Old F., to the first conjugation of a Lat. verb of another conjugation, and fails to meet the equally serious second objection. This is, that the Old French verb at first has the diphthong ei only in the stem-accented forms, the others having simple e, and has simple d for Lat.  $\bar{a}$  in accented inflexions; thus while the 1st sing. pres. ind. is esfrei, the infinitive is esfree, with two simple vowels. This shows that the original stem-vowel was followed by simple d or t, not by g or k, with which it would have given the diphthong ei in the stem-syllable whether accented or unaccented, and the diphthong ie for Latin  $\bar{n}$  in accented terminations; thus O. Fr. freier (Mod. F. frayer, E. fray, to rub) from Lat. frieāre, has the two diphthongs ei and ié. Similarly, the Prov. veib is not efreidar, but esfredar, with simple e; a fact equally excluding freit from frigidum, which, like F. froid, has the diphthong in compounds whether accented or unaccented. The only primitive, M. Paris points out, which satisfies these conditions, is the Late Lat. exfridure, from Teutonic friou, peace ; so that the original meaning of the O. F. word is "to put out of peace," "disturb," "disquiet." This etymology explains the frequent use of the O. F. participle esfree with the meaning "disturbed in mind," "angry," and the still later use of effraye de peur to express what effraye now does alone. The primary meaning is better kept in the O. F. subst. esfrei, which often means "tumult," "noise;" but for its literal preservation we must look to the Mod. Eng. subst. affray (fray), which means now, as it did when it was formed, " a breach of the peace." One little point deserves mention. Friou, in the Old Teutonic technical sense, like "the king's peace" in considerably later days, was applied specially to highways and other public places; and to this day affray, as a law term, is used only of private fighting in a public place, not of a disturbance inside a house.'-H. Nicol.

ADVENTURE, 1. 7. The O. F. aventure is derived rather from Low L. aduentura, an adventure, a sb. analogous to Lat. sbs. an -tura. Latin abounds with such sbs., ending (nearly always) in tura or -sura; see a list of some in Roby's Latin Grammar, 3rd ed. t. i. § 893. Roby describes them as 'Substantives; all feminine, with similar formation to that of the future participle. These words

*AFFREIGHTMENT, the act of hiring a ship for the transportation of goods. (F., -L. and G.) Still in use. Blount gives affretamentum, with a reference to Pat. 11 Hen. IV. par. 1. 80. 12, which represents an O.F. affretenet, the same word as mod. F. affretement, the hiring of a ship (Littré). Formed with suffix-mean from O.F. affreter (mod. F. affreter), to hire a ship (Littré). - La*. af-, for ad, prefix; and F. fret. 'the fraught or fraight of a ship, also the hire that's paid for a ship, or for the fraught thereof; 'Cotgrave This fret is of G. origin; see further under Fraught. AFFRONT. It has been suggested to me that the O.F. afronter

AFFRONT. It has been suggested to me that the O. F. afronter is more likely to be from the very common Lat. phrase a fronte, in front to one's face, than from ad frontem, which is comparatively rare.

*AFTERMATH, a second crop of mown grass. (E.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xvii. c. 8. Somner gives an A. S. form mé?, but it is unauthorized. Here math = a mowing; allied to Mow, and to Moead (2), q v. Cf. G. makd. a mowing, machmakd, aftermath. *AGISTMENT, the pasturage of cattle by agreement. (F.,=L)See Halliwell; Blount gives a reference for the word, anno 6 Hen.VI. cap. 5. and instances the verb to agist and the sbs. agistor, agistage. All the terms are Law French. The F. verb agister occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I., vol. iii. 231; agistement in the same, iii. 23; and agistours, pl. in the Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 161, an. 1311. The sbs. are from the vb. agister, lit. to assign a resting-place or lodging. = F. a (Lat. ad), to; and O.F. giste, 'a bed, couch, lodging. glace to lie on or to rest in, 'Cotgrave. This O.F. giste = mod. E. gist; see Gist.

AGNAIL. I now suspect that this article is incorrect, and that the E. angonaille has had little to do with the matter except in extending the meaning to a corn on the foot, &c. See Catholicon Anglicum, p. 4, note 4. It is better to consider the word, as commonly used, as E., since there is authority for A. S. angnægi. In Gascoigne, ed. Hazlitt, ii. 313, we are told that hartshorn will 'skime a kybed [chilblained] heel, or fret an angnæyle off,' where the word is absurdly misprinted as anguayle. – A. S. angnægi, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 81, § 34. The form agnail corresponds with O. Fries ogneil, variant of ongneil, a misshapen nail due to an injury. The prefix *ang*is from A. S. ange, in the orig. sense of 'compressed,' whence the compounds angniss, sorrow, anguish, &c.: see Anger. The A. S. nægi = mod. E. nail. It remains true that hang-nail is a corrupted form. Thus agnail is an A. S. word, prob. modified by confusion with French.

AGOG. This article is entirely wrong; I was misled by Vigfnsson's translation of Icel. gægjask as 'to be all agog.' We may first note an excellent example of on gog in Gascoigne's Poems, ed. Hazlitt, ii. 288, viz. 'Or, at the least, yt setts the harte on gogg,' i.e. astir; The Griefe of Joye, thyrde Songe, st. 21. As an additional example, take the following: 'Being set agog to thinke all the world otemele;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Phocion, § 11. It greatly resembles W. gog, activity; cf. W. gogi, to agitate. Perhaps a-gog = on gog, in agitation, in a state of activity. But gog does not seem to be a genuine Celtic word; so that this solution also fails. We must, in any case, set aside Icel. gægjask and gægjur, G. gucken, and probably also the F. à gogo.

Indist, in any case, set and rates z = 0 and z = 0. probably also the F. à gogo. \*AGRIMONY, a plant. (F., -L, -Gk.) M. E. agremoine, egremoine, Chaucer, C. T. 16268. - O. F. agrimoine, aigremoine, 'agrimony, or egrimony;' Cot. -L ow L. agrimoinia, corruption of L. argemonia, a plant, Pliny, xxv. 9 (White). We also find L. argemone, Pliny, xxvi, 9, answering to a Gk.  $\Delta \gamma \epsilon \mu \Delta m$ . So called, in all probability, from being supposed to cure white spots in the eye. -L. argema, a small ulcer in the eye, Pliny, xxv. 13, xxviii. 11 (White). -Gk.  $\delta \rho \gamma \epsilon \mu \sigma$ ,  $\delta \rho \gamma \epsilon \mu \sigma$ , a small white speck or ulcer on the eye (Liddell and Scott). -Gk.  $\delta \rho \gamma \delta \sigma$ , white, shining.  $-\sqrt{ARG}$ , to shine. See Argent.

*AIR (2), an affected manner. (F.) In the phrase 'to give onesell airs,' &c. In Shak. Wint. Tale, v. 1. 128. – F. aire, mien. The same as Ital. aria, mien. See Debonair; and see note on Malaria (below).

AISILE. It appears, from the quotations made for the Phil. Soc. Dict., that the s in the E. aisle was suggested by the s in E. isle, and was introduced, curiously enough, independently of the s in the F. spelling aisle. Both E. and F. spellings are various and complicated. See Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 18, 1880.

AIT. Add: M. E. eit, spelt eit, Layamon, 23873; whence eitland, an island, Layamon, 1117.

in a public place, not of a disturbance inside a house. - H. Nicol. *AITCH-BONE, the rump-bone. (Hybrid; F., - L. and E.) I entirely subscribe to this derivation of affray from Low Lat. Miss Baker, in her Northamp. Gloss, gives 'aitch-bone, the extreme (Webster), ice-bone (Forby), nache-bone (Carr's Craven Glossary). All the forms are corruptions of nache-bone, i.e. rump-bone. The nache is 'the point of the rump;' Old Country Words, E. D. S., p. 97. We find nache also in Fitzherbert's Husbandry (Glossary); and nach in G. Markham's Husbandry (Of Oxen). The earliest example I have found is hach-boon, Book of St. Albans, leaf f 3, back; A. D. 1486. - O.F. nache, sing. of naches, the buttocks (Roquefort). - Low Lat. naticas, acc. of natica, buttocks; not in Ducange, but cited by Roquefort. Dimin. of L. nates, pl. of natis, the rump. Allied to Gk. vŵrov, the back; cf. Skt. nati, a bowing down, from nam, to bow ¶ Dr. Murray draws my attention to the fact down, sink, bend. that Mr. Nicol obtained this etymology (independently) in 1878; see Minutes of Meetings of Phil. Soc. Feb. 1, 1878.

AJAR. It is worth adding that the A.S. cyrre (better cerre), tlat. of cerr, a turn, usually appears in adverbial phrases. Thus æt sumum cyrre, at some time, Luke xxii. 32; æt óbrum cerre, at another time, Ælfred. tr. of Boethius, cap. xxxv. § 2; æt ánum cierre, at the same time, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, cap. lxi., ed. Sweet, p. 455, last line.

AKIMBO. Possibly (E. and Scand.), the prefix a- being the common E. prefix marked A-(a). Mr. E. Magnusson has kindly given me a probable solution of the word. Starting from the M. E. phrase in kenebowe, which may be considered to represent in kenbowe, he compares this with Icel. keng-boginn, crooked, bent into a crook, compounded of Icel. kengr, a crook, a staple, bend, bight, and boginn, pp. of the lost strong verb bjuga. to bow, just as A. S. bogen is the pp. of bugan; see Bow (1). The Icel. kengr is allied to Swed. kink, a twist in a rope, mod. E. kink; see Kink. Note the phrase beygoi kenginn, i. e. he bent the staple. Edda, ii. 285. Cf. Norweg. kink, a bend, kjeng, a staple, kinkutt, crooked, bowed.  $\beta$ . Thus kimbo (for kin-bo, M. E. kenbowe) is, in fact, kink-bowed, bent into a staple-like form. Hence Dryden well uses it to express the curved handles of a cup, translating the Lat. ansa, Virgil, Ecl. iii. 45. To place the arms akimbo is to place them with the back of the knuckles against the side, so that the elbows stick out like the handle of a jug. I may here add that Richardson actually uses kembo as a verb. 'Oons, madam, said he, and he kemboed his arms, and strutted up to me. . . "Kemboed arms! my lord, are you not sorry for such an air?" Sir C. Grandison, ed. 1812, iv. 288, 290 y. Yet it must be confessed that even this ingenious (Davies). solution is not altogether satisfactory; it hardly explains how in came to be a part of the M.E. phrase. Wedgwood points out that Cotgrave, s.v. quarrer [not quarrir] has ' to carry his armes akemboll, and, s. v. anse, has les bras courbez en anse, with armes akemboll. He seems to take akemboll to be the older form, but we have no proof of this, as the M.E. spelling is in kenebows. I fear the word remains unsolved, for lack of sufficient data.

ALABASTER. Not (L., - Gk.), but (F., -L., - Gk.). From O. F. alabastre, for which see Littré, s. v. albatre.

ALBATROSS. (Port., - Span., - Arab., - Gk.) F. albatros, formerly algatros; but this F. form was prob. borrowed from English. - Port. alcatraz, a cormorant, albatross; Span. alcatraz, a pelican. -Port. alcatruz, Span. arcaduz, a bucket. - O. Span. alcaduz, a bucket (Minsheu). - Arab. al-qadús, lit. the bucket. - Arab. al, the ; Gk. rádos, a water-vessel. Similarly the Arab. saqqú, a watercarrier, means a pelican, because it carries water in its pouch. See Devic, Supp. to Littré. Note also that Drayton uses the Port, form : 'Most like to that sharp-sighted alcatraz;' The Owl. In An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 94 (ab 1565) it is said that certain sea-birds were "by the Portuguese called Aleatrarses." ALBUM. The mod. E. use of the word, in the sense of a white book, is of course a modification. The Lat. album, like Gk. Aeviraya, meant a tablet covered with gypsum for writing public notices on. *ALCAYDE, a judge. See Cadi below. ALCOHOL. 'Applied to the black sulphid of antimony, which is used as a collyrium. Cf. Ezek. xxiii. 40 in Heb. and LXX. The idea of fineness and tenuity probably caused this word to be applied also to the rectified spirit. "They put betweene the eye-lids and the eye a certaine blacke powder . . . made of a minerall brought from the kingdome of Fez, and called Alcohole; "Sandys' Travels, 1632, p. 67. (T. L. O. Davies, Supplementary Glossary.) ALEMBIC. In Rich. Dict. p. 175, is a note that Arab. anbik is pronounced ambik, which accounts for the m in Spanish, &c.

ALGUM. Heb. 'algúmmím, 'almuggím. The latter is supposed to be the better form; Gesenius doubts the identification with Skt. valguka.

ALLAY. Instead of calling this (F., - L.), it is much better to mark it as (E.). The M. E. alaien (also aleggen) is precisely the A. S. álecgan, to lay down, hence to put down. - A. S. á- (prefix); end of a rump of beef, cut obliquely.' It also appears as edge-bone twolle alaye,' i. e. put down, Arthur, ed. Furnivall (E.E.T.S.), p. 219. The confusion with the O. F. derivative of L. alleuiare is duly noted by Mätzner, who gives several examples. My account at p. 16 is confused and misleading.

ALLELUIA. Read 'the Piel modification,' not 'the Pial voice;' see Kalisch, Heb. Gr. sect. 37. For 'jehóvah, God,' read 'jahvek [or yahvek], Jehovah.'-A. L. M.

ALLIGATOR. Called 'a monstrous legarto or crocodile' by

J. Hortop in 1591; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 314. ALLODIAL. Dele from beginning of §  $\gamma$  to the end of the article. The derivation quoted from Vigfusson's Icel. Dict. cannot well be accepted. The forms alodis, allodis occur in the Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern; on which Hessels remarks, 'on this word cf. Monumenta Germaniæ historica, Legg. III. p. 104, 282, 312; Diez, Wörterbuch, s.v. allodio.' According to Diez, it is from O. H. G. aló ', full ownership

ALLOT. This hybrid compound was due to Anglo-French, which formed a verb from the E. word lot. The pp. alote, allotted, occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 337. Godefroy also cites Anglo-F. allotement, Littleton's Tenures, ed. 1577, fol. 54, back.

ALLOY, to combine metals, to mix gold and silver with metals of less value.  $(F_{.,-} L)$  The etymology given at p. 17 is the popular one, and is adopted by Diez. Scheler, and Littré, though the last of these expresses doubt. But it is certainly wrong, and due to a misunderstanding of early date, since even Cotgrave gives aloy with one l, as if it were compounded of a and loy, law. The truth is that the sh. is a derivative of the verb. We already find the pp. alayed in P. Plowman, B. xv. 346. This is from an Anglo-F. alayer\*, equivalent to O. F. aleier, aloier, old spelling of F. allier; see allier in Littre; and cf. s'aleier in Chanson de Roland, 1. 990. Cotgrave gives alier, allier, 'to stiffen, or imbase gold, &c., by mingling it with other metals.' - Lat. alligare, to bind fast. - Lat. al., for ad, to; ligare, to bind. Thus alloy is a doublet of Ally, q.v.  $\beta$ . The etymology is proved by Ital. legare, 'to solder or combine mettals,' Florio; whence the sb. lega, 'aloy,' id.; for lega can only be derived from legare, and could not have come from Lat. acc. legem (which gave Ital. legge). Cf. also Port. ligar, 'to allay metals;' whence liga, sb., 'allaying of metals;' Vieyra. Even Spanish has ligar, to alloy, liga, alloy, as well as the comp. alear, to alloy. The derivation from ligare thus becomes irrefutable. The Anglo F. alay, sb., occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 140. an. 1300. Godefroy, s, v. aloier, cites several examples of the spelling allayer.

ALLURE. The pp. aluryd occurs in 1538; see Orig. Letters, d. Ellis, ii. 83. The Anglo-F. alurer, to allure, occurs in Wright's ed. Ellis, ii. 83. The Anglo-F. alurer, to allure, occurs in Wright's Voc. i. 151. Other similar derivatives of lure occur in the forms enlured, i. e. lured as a hawk, in the Book of St. Albans (1486), leaf d 3, back; and ilurid, with the same sense, id. leaf d 4.

ALMANAC. 1 unfortunately took the Gk. form  $d\lambda \mu \epsilon \nu a \chi \dot{a}$  from Brachet, who is mistaken. The Gk. word is ad µerixiana, neut. pl.; the phrase er rois adueriziarois occurs in Eusebius, as cited. But it is hardly possible to derive almanac from this Gk. form. The etymology is almost hopeless ; but it may perhaps be traced, through F. almanac, Span. almanac (or almanaque) to Arab. al, the, and manakh, a calendar, used in the Toledo tables compiled in the 13th century; see Tyr-whitt's note to Chaucer, C. T. 11585. This manakh is not a true Arabic word, but prob. of Gk. origin; perhaps from Gk. µhv, a month. It may be noted that the Lat. manacus, in Forcellini, is a false form, due to a misreading. The right reading is menaeus = Gk µnraios, the zodiac. It occurs in Vitruvius, de Archit. ix. 8, the other readings being maneus, manaeus. See the ed. by Rose and Müller-Strübing, Lipsiæ, 1867

ALMOND. Not (F., -Gk.), but (F., -L., -Gk.); as the context shews. Dr. Murray explains the spelling with al by supposing that, in the Span. almendra, the al was put for a by confusion with the Arabic article al. In this case, there must have been an O.F. form almande as well as amande, though it is not given in Littré or Burguy. We find, however, the Anglo-F. pl. alemaundes in the Liber Albus, p. 224; alemande in Roquefort, and the very form almande in Godefroy, but given s. v. alemande. The Gk. duuydahn is said to be of Phrygian origin (Wharton, Etyma Græca).

ALOE. Cf. lignum aloes in Mandeville, Trav. pp. 218, 241; galle and aloes,' Test. of Love, in Chaucer's Works, 1561, fol. 286, col. 2. The word agallochum is Aryan, not Semitic; Gesenius says that the Heb. 'ahálim is not a Semitic word, but of Indian origin. Cf. Skt. aguru, aloe-wood. appearing in various Ind. dialects as aghil, agaru, aguru; see Wilson's Skt. Dict.

ALONG. The note, in the former edition, that E. along is different from Icel. endilangr is wrong. Dr. Murray remarks that the A.S. andlang was at first an adjective, and afterwards a preposition, and that, as an adj., it is precisely the Icel. endilangr or endlangr, legan, to lay; see Lay (1). Note particularly: Thy pryde we i.e. all along, throughout the length. See A.S. and lang in Bosworth's

A.S. Dict. (new edition). The M. E. endelong was a modification of  $\stackrel{\oplus}{\oplus}$  ferent words. Again, in Wedgwood's Dict., s. v. amercement, 1 find A.S. andlang, due to confusion with ende (end), and loss of the sense of the prefix. Yet it is not altogether wrong, for the connection between end and the prefix and-is real: see End. Aling is, in fact, anti-long or end-long (taking end in the sense of parallel edge), side by side.

*ALONG (2), in the phr. along of or along on. (E.) This is not quite the same word as along (1), but differs in the prefix. We find 'It's all 'long on you,' Prol. to the Return to Parnassus (1606). Chaucer has: 'urbareon it was along;' C. T. 16398; and again: 'Som seide it was long on the fyr-making,' id. 16390. Gower has: 'How al is on myself along;' C. A. ii. 22 (bk. iv). Here along is a corruption of ilong, and long is ilong without the initial i. This prefix i- is the usual M. E. form of the A. S. prefix ge-, and along answers, accordingly, to A. S. gelang, as pointed out by Todd in his ed. of Johnson's Dict. Moreover, the very form ilong (used with on) occurs in Layamon, 15502. - A. S. gelang, as in on daim gelang, along of that, because of that, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, bk. iv. c. 10, § 9. - A.S. ge-, prefix; and lang, long. Thereisely the same corruption of the prefix occurs in Aware, q. v. ALLPHABET. Rather (Gk., - Phoenician) than (Gk., - Heb.).

ALPHABET. Rather (Gk., – Phoenician) than (Gk., – Heb.). The Gk. and Heb. letters were from a common (Phoenician) source, -A. L. M.

ALREADY. Probably (E.), not (Scand.). See Ready.

ALTAR. The word occurs, in the dat. case altare, in the A.S. Gospels, Matt. v. 24; but only in one MS., all the rest (including MS. B., which Kemble has not noted) have wefede, weofede, wigbed, &c. I therefore adhere to my opinion, that the M.E. alter was borrowed from O. French, and that the spelling altar (with a few exceptions) is comparatively late. Of course the opposite view, that the word was borrowed (like O. Sax. altari) directly from Latin, is perfectly tenable. Fortunately, it does not much matter.

ALTERCATION. The O.F. altercation is quite right; I now observe that Littré gives an example of it as occurring in the 13th century. Authority for the F. form occurs also in the Anglo-French altercacioun, in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 332. ALTOGETHER. M.E. altogedere, Ancren Riwle, p. 320, l. 25.

ALTOGETHER. M. E. altogedere, Ancren Riwle, p. 320, l. 25. *ALTRUISM, regard for others. (Ital., -L.; with Gk. suffix.) I have frequently been asked for the etymology of this queerlycoined word, the sense of which is obvious to the student of Italian, and (apparently) to no one else. It is coined (with the Greek suffix -ism) from Ital. altrui, another, others. - Ital. altro, nom. sing. masc.; altra, nom. sing. fem.; altri, nom. pl.; which, when preceded by any preposition, is changed into altrui for both genders and numbers (Meadows). - L. alterum, acc. of alter, another.

AMALGAM. Not  $(F_{.,-}Gk_{.})$ , but  $(F_{.,-}L_{,-}Gk_{.})$ . But the derivation from  $\mu d\lambda a \gamma \mu a$ , given by Mahn, Littré, Scheler, and Diez, is not very satisfactory. Devic (Supp. to Littré) traces the Low Lat. amalgama back to the 13th century, and says that it occurs in Albertus Magnus and Arnoldus de Villa Nova. He thinks it may be Arabic, but fails to prove it so. AMAZON. The usual derivation of Gk.  $d\mu a \zeta d\nu$ , which I give,

AMAZON. The usual derivation of Gk. dµa(úv, which I give, is probably fabulous, and the story an invention intended to satisfy a popular craving for an etymology. AMBASSADOR, 1. 10. The form ambactia is not the form in

ANBASSADOR, 1. 10. The form ambactia is not the form in the MSS. of the Salic Law, but the forms ambassia, ambassia, ambassia, all occur there, and the word there signifies a charge, office, or employment; see Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern, 1880. Ambactia* is the theoretical form whence all the others proceed.

AMBER. Perhaps (F., – Span., – Arabic) instead of from the Arabic directly. We find M. E. aumbre, Prompt. Parv. – F. ambre; Cot. – Span. ambar. – Arab. 'ambar, ambergris, a rich perfume and cordial;' Rich. Dict. p. 1031.

AMBRY. Add: M. E. awmery, awmebry, Prompt. Parv. p. 18; which assists the etymology. O. F. almaire, Roman de Rou, 4565.

AMEN. Heb. 'amén; the initial 'alef should be represented by the smooth breathing. The primary meaning of the  $\sqrt{}$  'aman is 'to be firm, to be fixed;' the transitive meaning is secondary.—A. L. M.

A MERCIEMEINT. Wedgwood's strictures on this article should be read, though they seem to me to be contradictory. He considers that the F. verb amercier was formed from the phrase à merci, because the Lat. phrase for to be liable to punishment at the discretion of the court was poni in misericordia. At the same time, he admits that merci and misericordia have no etymological connection, and censures me for saying that any one has ever implied that they have. Yet Blount, in his Nomo-Lexicon, says 'merci, i. misericordia,' and to shew that he actually supposes these words to be connected, refers us to misericordia, and then to moderata misericordia, translating the latter by a moderate amerciament, emphasised by italics. There is hint in Blount, that merci and misericordia are dif-

nored, though the etymology of mercy (to which there is no crossreference) is rightly given. Thirdly, Roquefort, who was no etymologist, expressly derives mercy from misericordia; so do Minshen and Johnson ! Under the circumstances, it is worth while to repeat that no phrase involving misericordia is of any use in explaining misers of the words, admittedly, are unconnected. B. Much more to the point is the passage which Wedgwood cites, from Ducange, as occurring in Hincmar (9th cent.): 'Cum per wadia emendaverit quod misfactum patebat, mandaveritque mihi se velle ad meam mercedem venire, et sustinere qualem illi commendas en harmiscarum,' i.e. that he would come to put himself at my mercy. and would submit to whatever amercement I should impose upon him. This suggests the derivation of O. F. amercier from the phrase ad mercedem, and such may be the right explanation. Yet it merely brings us back to the word merces, already correctly assigned by me as the Lat. word upon which amercement is founded. On the other hand, O. F. has also the simple verb mercier, from which, according to Burguy, both O. F. amercier and mod. F. remercier were formed: so that the idea of this derivation did not at all originate with me, as supposed. Roquefort gives to the simple verb mercier both senses, (1) to thank, (2) to pay; cf. 'Deus le vus merciet,' may God repay you; Chanson de Roland, 519. Mercedem soluere, to make payment, occurs in Juvenal, vii. 157; so that the sense of 'pay' for the O. F. mercier causes no difficulty. Hence O. F. amercier. to fix a payment, to impose a fine, could quite easily have been formed, without the phrase ad mercedem; but if the reader likes to consider this phrase as the true origin, he has only to amend my article accordingly. AMITY. Spelt amyte in Skelton, Why Come ye Nat to Courte. 1. 371.

AMMONIA. The Egyptian origin is certain. Peyron gives the Coptic amoun, the name of a great tower in Egypt; the name of a mountain; also, glory, height, high. And see Smith's Classical Dictionary. 'In the writings of Synesius, bp. of Pentapolis, we have an account of the preparation of the sal ammoniacus by the priests of Jupiter Ammon, and its transmission [from the Liby an desert] to Egypt in baskets made of the leaves of palms;' I. Taylor, Words and Places. ¶ Otherwise, the name 'Aµµúw is from Egypt. Amous (in Heb.'Amón, Jer. 46, 25), the supreme deity of the Egyptians, orig. worshipped at Thebes as Amen-Ra, or Amen the sun. His name means 'the hidden.' See Ebers, in Gesenius, Heb. Dict., 8th ed. p. 54; Smith, Dict. of the Bible.—A. L. M.

AMMUNITION. Probably  $(F_{..}-L.)$ , not (L.) The Low L. admunitio, not in common use, appears to have nothing to do with it. The E. ammunition appears to be an E. spelling of the old popular F. amunition, given by Littre as an archaic form of F. munition, and possibly due to misunderstanding la munition as l'amunition. See therefore Munition.

AMULET, 17. In the later edition of Richardson, the word occurs on p. 580. The Arabic origin of this word is disputed. *ANA, ANNA, the sixteenth part of a rupee. (Hindustani.)

*ANA, ANNA, the sixteenth part of a rupee. (Hindustani.) Hind. ána (written áná in Skt.), the sixteenth of a rupee, commonly, but incorrectly, written anna. Also used as a measure, to express a sixteenth part of a thing; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms. p. 24. ANAGRAM. Not (F.,-Gk.), but (F.,-L.,-Gk.). The con text so explains it. ANALOGY, ANATOMY. Correct as in Anagram (above). ANCHORITE. Not (F., -Gk.), but (F., -Low Lat., -Gk.). See the context.

ANDIRON. At p. 197 of Wright's Vocab. we find Hec andena. Anglice awndyren; where awndyren is a later form than awndyre. See also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 16, note 1.

*ANILINE, a substance which furnishes a number of dyes. (F., -Span., -Arab., -Pers.) Modern. Formed with suffix -ine (F.-ine, Lat.-inus) from anil, a shrub from which the W. Indian indigo is made. 'Anil... is a kind of thing to dye blue withal;' Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, vi. 18 (ab. 1586). - F. anil, anil. - Span. anil, 'azure, skie colour;' Minsheu, p. 25, l. 12. - Arab. an-nil, put for al nil, where al is the def. art., and nil is borrowed from Pers. nil, the indigo-plant, lit. blue; cf. Skt. nili, the indigo-plant. See Lilao, Nylghau.

ANNUITY. It occurs as early as A. D. 1408, in the Will of Hen. IV; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 204. The Anglo-F. annuite occurs in the year-books of Edw. I., iii. 179.

ANT. 'Chameleon, amete; 'Wright's Voc. ii. 15 (11th cent.). But it is spelt amette in the place to which I refer. The M. E. form amte occurs in Wyclif, Prov. vi. 6.

ANTARCTIĆ. M. E. antartik, Mandeville's Trav. p. 180, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, ii. 25. 7.

ANTELOPE. Spelt anteloppe in 1506, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. & Morte Arthure, 3244, and Mandeville, p. 256, means 'a collection 116; antlop in 1486, Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. fol. c 8, back; antelop, A.D. 1432, in Liber Albus, iii. 459. The E. spelling is probably due to O. French, for Godefroy gives the O. F. antelop as well as a commoner form antelu. So also Palsgrave gives O. F. antelop as the F. for 'anteloppe, a beest.' ANTICHRIST. It occurs as M. E. Anteerist, Mandeville's Travels, ch. xxvi.; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 173. l. 83. ANTLER. (F.,-L.) Spelt awntelere in the Book of St. Albans, leaf e 1, back; auntelere, Reliquiæ Antiq. i. 151. The etymology given is wrong, and the supposition that t stands for d is also wrong. On the contrary, the forms and ouiller and endouiller in Cotgrave are corruptions, respectively, of O. F. antoillier, entoillier, cited by Littré. Of these, the former answers to a Low Lat. antocularium * (Scheler), lit. that which is in front of the eye. If this be so, the etymology is from Lat. ante oculum, before the eye. See Ante- and Ocular. Cf. F. oeiller, adj., belonging to the eye (Cotgrave), from Lat. ocularius.

ANVIL. 'Incus, anfilte,' Wright's Voc. i. 34, col. 2 (this is the same as the ref. to Ælf. Glos. ed. Somer, p. 65). Also 'Cudo, anfilte,' id. i. 286, col. 2. 'Incuda [sic], onfilti,' Wright's Voc. ii 111 (8th cent.). Quite distinct from Du. aanbeeld; and the curious spelling onfilti, found so early as in the 8th century, seems to me entirely to preclude the possibility of considering it as a formation from A. S. fealdan, to fold, in order to make it answer to O. H. G. aneualz, an anvil (from O. H. G. valdan, to fold). We also find the curious and obscure gloss (likewise of the 8th century): 'Cudo, i. percutio, cedo, vel onfile;' Wright's Voc. ii. 137, col. 1. The spelling anfeld occurs as late as 1502, in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 245. β. There are some noteworthy remarks on this word in Koolman's E. Fries. Dict. s. v. ambolt and s. v. filt, where he suggests that the O. H. G. aneualz cannot be from O. H. G. valdan, to fold (indeed, the z forbids it), but is rather connected with G. falzen, to groove, join (fit together). The A. S. onfilti points back to the same base filt- or fall-, and then it becomes a question whether we may connect this with G. filz, E. felt, and whether felt itself may be from a root signifying 'to beat together.' The anvil would then be that whereon iron is felted, i.e. welded together. The spelling anvelde

APOCALYPSE, APOCOPE. Not (Gk.), but (L., – Gk.). APPAL. Not (Hybrid), but (F., – L). This article is, I regret to say, quite wrong, as also that on Pall. Appal and pall are both from F. pâle (O. F. palle, pasle), pale, Lat. pallidus, and are allied to pale and pallid. The O. F. appalir, apalir is the immediate source of appall, and is derived from O. F. a (Lat. ad), prefix, and O. F. pasle, pale. See Pale (2). B. Cotgrave has appalir, 'to grow or make pale' [misprinted appailir in ed. 1600]; appali, 'growne or made pale.' Palsgrave has 'I appale ones colour, Ie appalis; 1 appalle, as drinke dothe or wyne, whan it leseth his colour or ale whan it hath stande longe, Ie appalys; and again, 'Is palle, as drinke or bloode dothe by longe standyng in a thynge, Ie appallys;' and 'I palle, I fade of freshenesse in colour or beauty, Ie flaitris.' Cotgrave also shews (as above), that the verb appalir was transitive as well as neuter. Mätzner rightly gives the derivation from O. F. appalir, and cites another quotation from Chaucer, C. T. 10679 (Sq. Ta. F. 365), where appalled may simply be explained as 'pale' or 'faded in look,' instead of 'languid,' as given in my glossary when writing under a false impression. Wedgwood truly says that I followed his bad example in rejecting the obvious derivation from O. F. appalir; I now follow his good example in admitting it.

APPLE, I. 2. Cf. 'Prunelle, the ball, or apple, of the eie;' Cot. See Catholicon Anglicum, ed. Herrtage, p. 11, note 5. ARABESQUE. The name of the country of Arabia is written 'arab in Rich. Dict. p. 1000.

ARBOUR. The common use of this word in provincial English, as applied to a harbour or rustic shelter clearly points to the derivation from parbour, to which I adhere. Dr. Stiatmann puts it as equivalent to M. E. herber, a garden of herbs, &c.; and there is no doubt that, in the passage which he cites, arber = M. E. herber. But this only proves a confusion between M. E. herber, of F. origin, and M.E. hereberge, a harbour; a confusion which I have already pointed out. The passage cited by Stratmann is curious and worthy of notice. It runs thus: 'In the garden, as I wene, Was an arber fair and grene, And in the arber was a tre;' Squire of Low Degree, 1. 28 (Ritson). As to the prov. E. arbour, a shelter, a sort of small hut without a door, a summer-house, I cannot be mistaken, having frequently heard it in Shropshire (where initial & does not exist), and, I believe, in Norfolk (where initial & is often misused). I look upon Florio's explanation of arborata by 'an arbor or bower of boughs or trees' as suggested by popular etymology. The M. E. arborye in javelin. Sce Lancegay.

*ARCH (1). Add : Hence the Court of Arches, ' originally held in the arches of Bow Church-St. Mary de Arcubus-the crypt of which was used by Wren to support the present superstructure; I. Taylor, Words and Places. And see Todd's Johnson.

ARCH (2). Stratmann suggests that arch is nothing but the prefix arch- (as in arch-bishop, arch-fiend, arch-traitor), used alone. No doubt this explains the form of the word correctly, but I cannot understand how it acquired its peculiar sense, unless it were partly confused with M.E. argh, as I suggest, though this M.E. form would certainly have become arrow, by rule. This is one of the points which the Philological Society's Dictionary will (I suppose) entirely clear up. See argh in Catholicon Anglicum, p. 12. Jamieson gives an example, from Douglas, of arch, timid, with guttural ch; and the same spelling is in the Ancren Riwle, p. 202, note a. It is not unlikely that the ch in this word was mistaken for ch as we now have it. \*ARCHIMANDRITE. (L., - Gk.) 'Archimandrite, an abbot, pilor, or chief of an hermitage; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. – Late L. archimandrita, a chief or principal of monks, an abbot; Sidonius Apollinaris, Ep. 8. 14 (White). – Late Gk.  $dp\chi_{\mu}ar\delta pir \eta_{5}$ , the same. – Gk.  $dp\chi_{\nu}$ , chief (see Arohi-);  $\mu ar\delta pa$ , an enclosed space, fold, (in late Gk.) a monastery; see Madrigal.

ARCHITECT. Also in Shak, Titus Andron. v. 3. 121. *ARECA, a genus of palms, of which one species produces the areca-nut or betel-nut (Canarese). From the Kamáta (Canarese) adiki, adike, betel or areca-nut; Wilson, Indian Terms, p. 7. The cerebral d is mistaken for r. 'Areca is corrupted from the Canarese adike. In Tamil, which has borrowed it, vetil adeka is 'betel and areca.' the leaf and the nut of one and the same tree.' (F. Hall.)

ARENA. The etymology of Lat. arena is often given from arere, to be dry. This is certainly wrong, not only because ārere has long a, but because the better form of the sb. is harena, whilst the Sabine form appears as fasena. The lit. sense is 'bright' or 'shining,' from  $\checkmark$ BHAS, to shine, whence also Lat. fettus, joyful. From the same root is the E. bare, q.v. As to A for f, see Horb: for the adj. suffix -ena, cf. eg-enus. See Lewis and Short, Lat. Dict.; Corssen, Aussprache, 2nd ed. i. 102.

AROINT THEE. Add, at the end : the Icel. ryma is from

Icel. ruim, room (by vowel-change of u to y); see Room. ARRANT. Not (E.), but (F., - L.). Whether the A.S. earg, M.E. arws, cowardly, had any influence upon this word, I will not now undertake to say. But further examination shews that arrant really stands for errant. Early examples are 'theef erraunt,' arrant thief, Chaucer, C. T. 17173; 'erraunt usurer;' P. Plowman, C. vii. 307; 'errant traytours,' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 105 (A.D. 1539); 'errant theues' and 'erraunt theefe' in Lever's Sermons (1550), ed. Arber, p. 66 ; 'errant whore,' Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xi. 57. In Holinshed's (really Stanihurst's) Desc. of Ireland, repr. 1808, p. 68, we find: 'ithey] gad and range from house to house like arrant knights of the round table.' Godefroy notes the form arrant as equivalent to errant. Cf. parson for person, &c. See Errant. ARRAS. We find 'draps d'Arras' mentioned in the Will of John of Gaunt (1397); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 156. So also 'peces of arras' in 1447; id. p. 283. ABSON. Anglo-French arsum, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 375;

Stat. of Realm. i. 96, an. 1285. ASAFOETIDA. Spelt azafedida, Amold's Chron. (ab. 1502), ed. 1811, p. 234. ASKANCE, obliquely. (Ital., -L.) Only the first five lines of this article can stand. The rest is wholly wrong. There is no O. F. a scanche. I unfortunately copied this, without verification, from Wedgwood's second edition (it is corrected in the third), not having access to Palsgrave at the moment, and forgetting to revise the statement. Palsgrave really has: 'A scanche, de trauers, en lorgnant;' but a scanche is here the English word, not the French. It is the earliest spelling of E. askance which I have as yet found. Here a is the usual E. a., prefix, in the sense of 'on' or 'in;' see A. (2); and skance I take to be borrowed from Ital. scanso, verbal sb. of the verb scansare, explained by Florio to mean 'to cancell, to blur, or blot foorth, to go a slope or a sconce, or a skew, to go sidelin, to stagger or go reeling, to auoide or shun a blow.' β. The Ital. scansare is compounded of s-, prefix (= L. ex, out, out of the way), and cansare, 'to go aslope, to give place,' Florio. This Ital. verb is probably derived from L. campsare, to turn or go round a place (hence, to bend aside); see White. Allied to Gk. "aurreur, to bend, W. cam, crooked.

*ASSAGAI, ASSEGAI. (Port., - Moorish.) Spelt azaguay in Sir T. Herbert, Travels (1665), p. 23. A word (like fetisk) in-troduced into Africa by the Portuguese. – Port. azagaia, a dart, the coverts of a forest. (F., -L.). See Blount, Nomo-Lexicon; Manwood, Forest Laws, &c. The word is due to F. essarter, 'to make glades in a wood, to grub up, or clear a ground of bushes, shrubs, thorns, &c.; 'Cotgrave. - Low Lat. exsortare, to grub up, occurring an. 1233 (Ducange); also spelt exartare. - Lat. ex, out, (Ducange). Sartare (= saritare*) is the frequentative of Lat. sarrire, essarie, to weed, grub up weeds (whence also sar-culum, a hoe); see essari in Diez. Cf. Gk. salpew, to sweep, sapos, a besom. The Lat. pl. exsarta, weeded lands, occurs in the Liber Custumarum, p. 660.

ASSIZE (1), l. 13. Add: the Low L. assidere also means 'to impose a tax.

*ASSOIL, to absolve, acquit. (F., -L.) In Spenser, F.Q. i. 10. 52. ii. 5. 19, &c. Lowland Sc. assoilyie, often miswritten assoilzie (with z for j=y). M. E. assoilen, P. Plowman, B. prol. 70, 3. 40, &c. We find Anglo French assoile, pres. sing subj. Liber Custumarum. 199; but the pp. pl. is spelt assoil, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 275, -O. F. assoldre, asoldre (Burguy); the same as absouldre (Cotgrave). - Lat. absoluere, to absolve. See Absolve, of which assoil is merely a doublet. ¶ I suspect that the form properly belongs to the pres. subj. or imperative, from the use of the phrase 'God assoil you, and the like.

ASSORT. Not (F.,-Ital., -L.), but (F., -L.). Brachet cannot be right about this; for Littré gives an example of F. assortir in the *ATABAL, a kettle-drum. (Span., - Arab.) In Dryden, Don Sebastian, Act I. sc. I. - Span. atabal, a kettle-drum. - Arab. a-, for al, the; tabl, a drum; cf. Pers. tambal, a drum. See Tabour.

*ATAGHAN. See Yataghan below.

ATTIRE. I withdraw much of this article (esp. as given in the first edition). Mr. Nicol's comments upon my article are so excellent, that I here print them entire, with the exception of a few prefatory remarks. 'Even the assertions respecting the subst. atir in Mid. E. and O. F. require an important qualification; they should read, "in Mid. E. and O. F. texts, as far as they have been read and glossed, the Mid. E. subst. atir is found earlier than the verb, and an O. F. subst. atir has not been found." The inferences that the Mid. E. subst. existed earlier than the verb, and that the O. F. subst. did not exist at all, are, at least in the present state of our lexicography, especially of O. F., entirely unwarranted. The non-connection, on the other hand, of O. F. atirer, to adorn, with tirer, to draw, though now well known to O. F. scholars, is not recognised in the dictionaries of Diez, Littré, and Scheler, so that in maintaining it Mr. Skeat has independently hit upon the truth. The O. F. words are, indeed, distinct in form as well as in meaning, "to adorn," or rather "to arrange," being really atirier with the diphthong ié in the infinitive, while the Mod. F. attirer, to draw, is O. F. atirer with simple  $\dot{\epsilon}$ . In his other propositions, Mr. Skeat has sometimes merely followed his predecessors, but in several cases he is solely responsible. As to all traces of O. F. atirier having utterly and long ago died out in France, not only was the word common in the 14th century, but it is nearly certain (only the i of the Ital. attiraglio raising a slight doubt) that the Mod. F. attirail, "apparatus," "implements," is one of its derivatives, and it is still more certain that in the heraldic term tire, a row (applied to the rows of the fur vair), and in the colloquial expression tout d'une tire, "at one go," "at a stretch," there survives the O. F. substantive from which atirier is derived. For the O. F. verb tirer, to adorn, which Mr. Skeat supposes to be the missing primitive of atirier, is a fiction; the verb atirier, to arrange, is what is termed a parasynthetic compound, that is, formed direct from the prep. a and the subst. tire, row-just as aligner, embarquer, come direct from a ligne, en barque, not from imaginary verbs, ligner, barquer. But even if atirier, with its derivatives, had long been extinct in French, that is no argument against its having been both common and of early introduction: still less does it give reason to believe that it was a purely Anglo-Norman word posterior to the Conquest. As a matter of fact, it must have been a very old word in the Romanic languages; the verb (and doubtless the primitive subst.) existed in Eastern French, the subst. in Italian, and both of them in Provencal, in each case with their special forms, showing that they cannot have been borrowed from Norman French, but must have developed independently from a common primitive, and have gone through a whole series of phonetic changes. Ital. tiera means "an assemblage," but an earlier meaning is preserved in the phrase correre a tiera, " to run in file;" while the Prov. tieira, besides being applied to the person in the senses of "get-up" (if I may use a colloquial expression), "de-meanour," is the regular word for "row," "series," and exists at ".v, with unchanged meaning, in the form tieiro. The Old

\*ASSART, the offence of grubbing up trees, and so destroying  $\stackrel{o}{\rightarrow}$  F. subst. tire (which, as already mentioned, survives in Mod. F.) the coverts of a forest. (F., -L.). See Blount, Nomo Lexicon; means "file" (of persons), "series," the phrase a tire meaning "in Manwood, Forest Laws, &c. The word is due to F. essarter, 'to order," "in succession;" the word no doubt, as stated in glossaries, also meant "dress" (as distinguished from mere "clothing ") " OFDEments," though no example is given. The possible dialectal O. F. forms tiere, tieire, found in Roquefort, also unfortunately want corroboration. The verb-Prov. atieirar, East. F. ateirieir, Norm. and Paris. ration. The verb—Prov. atterrar, East. F. atterrer, Norm. and Para. F. attrier—means "to arrange" (literally and figuratively), "adjust," "put in order," "prepare" (a meaning attire also had in English); when reflexive it means "to dress," "get one's self up." An excellent parallel to attrier, "to arrange," from tire, "row," is afforded by arrange itself, which derives from rank, "row," "ring;" while the change from "arranging" to "dressing" is equally well exemplified by deep originally. "to put at the pick of the set of the first of the set. change from "arranging" to "dressing is equally well excupiling by dress, originally "to put straight," from Lat. directus. All this shewa that the original meaning of the words was not "to adorn," and makes any connection with the Teutonic ir, "splendor" or "glory," extremely doubtful; and the origin is definitely excluded by the forms of the words, which are incompatible with the i of tir, and (to a less extent) with its absence of final vowel. The most primitive form is exhibited by the Prov. tieira, whose triphthong ies is reduced in other Prov. dialects to *i*è or *i*i; from the same prehistoric F. triphthong ièi are contracted the i of ordinary F. tire, atirier, the i of the stem-syllable of East. F. ateirieir. This iei is the ordinary diphthong ie plus an i derived from a following guttural or palatal, the existence of which is further shown by its having converted in French the ordinary é, East. F. èi, from Lat. accented ā of the verbendings, into the diphthong ié, East. F. ièi (seen in the -ier, East. F. -ieir, of the infin.). An example of the first phenomenon is Prov. pieitz (peitz), ordinary F. piz (now pis), East. F. peis (Mod. Burgun-dian pei) from pectus (iè from  $\check{e}$ , i from c=k); of the second, O. F. meitie (now moitie), East. F. moitieit, from medietatem (where the di formed a palatal consonant), whose the contrasts with the ordinary té of clarté (clāritātem), &c. These phonetic conditions are perfectly satisfied by an Early Teutonic feminine teurja, the predecessor of Middle Low Germ. tiere, O. H. G. ziarī; the é of Teut. éw is regularly diphthongised to id, and its u lost before a consonant, while the following supplies the final i of the triphthong iei in the stem-syllable, and the initial one of the F. ié in the final syllable of atirier. This Early Teut. teurja, O. H. G. ziari, has, however, nothing to do with the Early Teut. (Old E., Old Saxon, and Old Norse) fir; it has a different root-vowel, a different suffix, and a different gender. as well as a different meaning. The supposed change of meaning from "glory" to "ornament" must therefore be rejected, and with it must go the identification of the Early Mod. E. tire, "head-dress," with the O. E. tir, "glory;" as abundantly shown by the Prompto-rium "atyre or tyre of women, redimiculum" (chaplet, fillet), it is merely (as was to be expected) a contraction of attire—a substantive which may well have existed in O. F., though it may equally well be an Engl. formation from the verb, perhaps under the influence of the simple O. F. subst. tire. What has really occurred in German, and perhaps in Romanic (for the secondary meanings of the Rom. words may have developed independently) is the change of meaning from "row," "order," to "ornament," "demeanour;" the Romanic languages, indeed, preserve in Ital. tiera, Prov. tiero, F. tire, the oldest ascertainable meaning of the word, of which meaning we have, I believe, no example in O. H. German. In the Old Engl. tier, "row," of whose form and meaning (though Grein has but one example) there can be little doubt, and which is the real cognate of O. H. G. ziari, we find, however, the original meaning; whether this word, as is often said, survives in the Mod. E. tier, "row," is doubtful. [I hold that it does not .-- W. W. S.] I will only remark that tier used also to be spelt tire, though, according to Walker, tire meaning "row," and tier, were both pronounced as lear (of the eye); and that the O. F. form tiere, often given as the origin of tier, could hardly have occurred (if at all) in any dialect from which English has borrowed.'-H. Nicol.

AUGER. Add :- cf. Swed. nafvare. an auger (Widegren). Here nafvare is for nafgare*, from naf, a nave, and a word allied to

Icel. geirr, a spear; see gere in Rietz; and see Garfiah. AUGUR. We find Angle-French augurer, an augurer, augur, Langtost's Chron. i. 242; also augurie, augury, id. i. 10. Godefroy gives O. F. augereres, an augur, and augurie, augury. Hence, though augur itself was perhaps taken immediately from Latin, the derivatives augur-er, augur-y are from the French. *AUK, a sea-bird. (Scand.) Swed. alka, an auk; Icel. alka, alka. Hence Lat. alca; merely a Latinised form.

AUNT. Anglo-French aunte, Year-Books of Edw. L i. 47,

AUREOLE. This is given, at p. 43, s. v. Aureate, as a derivative of aurum, gold; and, in accordance with this, we find F. auréole. Ital., Span., and Port. aureola, a 'glory' or halo round a saint's head. We xxxvii, 27. I am inclined to believe this is really correct; but it has been contended that Lat. aureola was a corruption of areola, dimin. of area. It is further remarkable that F. aureole occurs (as in Cotgrave) as a corruption of laureole, a little laurel, misread as l'aureole. In the Cath. Angl. p. 84, we find : 'a Crowne, laurea, crinale, diodema (sic), corona, auriola;' and, in fact, Lat. laurea and laureola were both used in the sense of laurel crown; being derived from laurus, a laurel. It is most remarkable that the word occurs very early in English, in a passage which decidedly favours the common derivation. 'The meidenes habben .. a gerlaundesche schinende schenre then the sunne, auriole ihaten o latines ledene,' i.e. the maidens have a sort of garland, shining brighter than the sun, called auriole in the Latin speech; Hali Meidenhad, p. 23. The gratuitous theory that it is a corruption of areola has to contend with the fact that the form with au- occurs in Ital., M.E., Span., and Port. as well as in French, Godefroy gives O. F. aureole, adi., golden. Cf. Oriel. Oriole.

*AUTO-DA-FE, a judgment of the Inquisition; also, the execution of such judgment, when the decree or sentence is read out to the victims. (Port., -L.) Lit. 'act of faith.' - Port. auto, action, decree; da, short for de a, of the; fe, faith. [The Span. form is auto de fe, without the Span. art. la, which is the equivalent of the Port. art. a.] - Lat. actum, acc. of actus, act, deed; de, preposition; illa, fem. of ille, he; fidem, acc. of fides, faith. See Act and Faith. Worcester's Dict. has the following note: 'as the details of an auto-da-fe were first made familiar to the English public in an account of the Inquisition at Goa (a Port. colony in the E. Indies), published in the 17th (? 18th) century, the Port. form of the phrase has generally prevailed in E. literature.' Haydn, Dict. of Dates, has : ' 20 persons perish at an auto-da-fe at Goa, A.D. 1717; Malagrida, a Jesuit, burnt at Lisbon, 1761.

*AVADAVAT, a finch-like E. Indian bird. (Arab. and Pers.) "A corruption of amaduvad, the name by which the bird is known to Anglo Indians, and under which it was figured, in 1735, by Albin, Suppl. Nat. Hist. Birds, pl. 77, p. 72. Jerdon (Birds of India, ii. 361) says that Blyth has shewn that this word took its origin from the city of Akmedabad, whence the bird used to be imported into Europe in numbers."—A. Newton, in N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 198. Ahmedabad is near the Gulf of Cambay, on the W. coast of Hindostan; and its name is derived from Ahmed, a proper name, and the Pers. abad, city. Akmed is from Arab. 'akmad, very laudable, Rich. Dict. p. 33; from the root hamada, he praised; see Mohammedan.

AVALANCHE. Spelt valanche, Smollett, France and Italy, letter xxxviii (Davies).

AVAST. Dr. Stratmann suggests Ital. abbasta, or Span. abasta. The Ital. abbasta is out of the question; our sea words are only Scandinavian, Spanish, or Dutch, when not English. The Span. abastar is obsolete; Minsheu gives it only in the sense to be satisfied; at this rate, the imperative abasta would mean 'be satisfied,' or 'be content.' This is not at all the sense of avast; it is precisely equivalent to the common every-day English 'hold fast a bit,' or 'hold hard, i.e. wait a bit. The word is clearly, to my mind, Dutch, because the Dutch use vast for fast, and say how for houd. Thus Sewel gives vast houden, to hold fast, and the sb. houvast, a hold fast, a cramp-iron, a pinch-penny. How easily the Du, how vast would become awast with English sailors (who would probably not perceive that hold fast would do as well), needs not to be told.

AVERAGE. Wedgwood points out that this word occurs in three distinct senses (1) certain days' labour that the tenant was bound to do for his lord; (2) damage accruing to goods in the course of transport, esp. by sea; (3) an arithmetical mean of a number of values. Everything (as usual) turns upon chronology; these three senses occur in the above order, the first being the oldest. The first sense Wedgwood takes to be corrupted from 'Dan. hoveri, dutywork due to the lord.' From this I wholly dissent, and hold to the explanation I have already given at p. 44. In other respects I agree with him, and at once acknowledge that my explanation fails to account fully for the senses 2 and 3. I take the right account to be this. a. Sense 1, and the Low Lat. averagium, are to be explained from aver, a beast of burden, as to which I repeat what I have said at p. 44. This Low Lat. term presupposes the form average in Law French and English, which must have existed as the original form of averagium. Indeed, Littré gives the very form average in his Supplement, p. 29; and Godefroy gives O. F. average, service rendered by a vassal; A. D. 1382. B. Such a word being in existence, when it became necessary to introduce F. avaris (with sense 2), this new word was assimilated to the E. preexistent word which sounded like it, though really of different origin. This I can prove; for in Arnold's Chronicle (1502, repr. 1811), we find, actually find Lat. corona aureola in the Vulgate. Exod. xxv. 25, xxx. 3. \$ at p. 112, where he is speaking of dues or tolls paid upon wine, that one must ' pai or doo pay [cause to be paid] all maner auerays,' i.e. dues. But when, at p. 180, he has to use the word again, he speaks of 'custumes or subsidyes or auerage,' wrongly using a more familiar spelling. The form averays is more correct, and represents F. avaris, 'decay of wares or merchandise, leaking of wines; also, the charges of the carriage or measuring thereof;' Cot. This word (now spelt avarie) is the same as Span. averia, damage sustained by goods and merchandise, detriment received by ships and their cargoes (Neu-man); Ital. avaria. damage, shore-duties (Meadows); whilst Torriano (ed. 1688) explains the same by 'a sea-phrase, viz. a consumption or distribution of the loss made, when goods are cast away on purpose in a storm, to save the vessel.' Mr. Marsh, in his notes on the first volume of Wedgwood's Dictionary, informs us (says Wedgwood) that the word 'occurs very early in French, Ital., and Spanish, in the sense of charges incurred from various causes, or duties levied by the authorities.' Whether the F. borrowed the word from Span, or Ital. is not quite clear, but I assume it was from the latter because of the closer agreement in the spelling, and the word may have been Venetian. It seems to have arisen ' in the commerce of the Mediterranean;' Wedgwood. - Arab. 'awar, a rent in a garment, a blemish, fault, defect ; záti 'awar, torn or spoilt merchandise ; Rich. Dict. p. 1034. detect; 2ati awar, tom or spoilt merchandise; Kich. Dict. p. 1034. See Dozy; also Devic (Supp. to Littré), who remarks that the sense of mod. F. avarie is rather 'duties' than 'damage,' which he thinks tells somewhat against this etymology. But Cotgrave gives 'decay of wares' as the first meaning, which is amply suf-ficient.  $\gamma$ . Lastly, we come to sense 3. This is quite modern, and a purely E. extension of the term, due to writers such as Adam Smith. The word already meant the distribution among many of a lors insured at see and the corres heavens thill more remean of a loss incurred at sea, and the sense became still more general. 8. I conclude that sense I was mediaval, and  $(F_{..} - L_{.})$ ; that sense 2 came in about 1500 (perhaps earlier), being  $(F_{..} - Ital_{.} - Arab_{.})$ ; and that sense 3 is a modern development, by English writers. The form which was earliest known to us has been retained throughout; sense 1, belonging to that form, is obsolete; whilst senses 2 and 3 do not rightly belong to that form at all.

AVOIRDUPOIS. The modern form is wrong. It should be avoirdepois; with e, not u. The spelling in old editions of Shake-speare is therefore better. We find avoir de pois in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 259, A.D. 1311; and aver de poys in the same, i. 156, A.D. 1309; also avoir-de-peise in an E. poem, about A.D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii. 175. The F. avoir, though really an infinitive mood, was constantly used as a sb. (cf. leisure, pleasure), and the true sense was, accordingly, 'goods of weight,' i. e. goods sold by weight. We find aueyr (also auoir) with the sense of 'property' or 'goods' as early as in P. Plowman, C. vii. 32. This correction does not affect the etymology, except as relates to the du. The corresponding Latin words are, exactly, habere, de, and pensum. Avoirdupois (as if, to have weight) is, in fact, a mistake for avoirdepois (goods of weight).

AVOW. The following note, by Dr. Murray, is from the Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880. 'Diez takes F. avouer from advöcare, Littré, Burguy, and Brachet from advolare. Without presuming to "pose as an O. F. scholar," he thought there were certainly two O. F. avouer; 1 :- Lat. advooāre, cf. louer, jouer :- locare, jocare; 2:-Lat. ad-voltare*, cf. vouer, dévouer, Lat. voltare*, devoltare; the first two quotations in Littré belonging to advoltare, the rest to advocare. Both verbs were adopted in Eng.; No. 1 before 1200, and still in use; senses to appeal to, call upon (as lord), acknowledge (as lord, or in any relation), own, confess; hence Avowal, and the obs. Avoury, Avoue, avou, an acknowledged patron, mod. Advouve and Advourson (Advocationem); No. 2 before 1300, in senses to bind with a vow, dedicate, take a vow, make a vow, now obs. From this the obs. n. avow, "An avow to God made he." The F. aven belongs to avouer 1. In later Eng. they may have been looked upon as senses of one word, and were occasionally confused, as when a man avowed (advocavit) his sins, and avowed (advotavit) a pilgrimage by way of penance. AWAY. Cf. Icel. a/vega, astray, lit. off the way, out of the way. This may have influenced the sense of the E. word.

AWKWARD. The forms afigr, offgr, which have been guestioned, are in Vigfusson's Dictionary; the O. Sax. word which I print as avuk is given in the Glossary to the Heliand, where the letter which I print as v is denoted by a b with a line drawn through the upper part of the stem. Prof. Stephens calls attention to a passage too important to be passed over. In the Prologue to St. Matthew's Gospel, in the Northumbrian version, ed. Kemble, p. 2, l. 11, the Lat. word perversa is glossed by widirworda vel afulic. Comparison with the Icel. and O. Sax. forms shews that afulic here stands for afuklic (or afuglic), i. e. awk-like, with the sense of perverse. This is clear evidence that the mod. E. awk in awk-ward was represented by afuk in O. Northumbrian. Palsgrave has: 'auke<sup>4</sup> Scotch name Blair, I do not know, but it clearly is not badger. stroke, revers'; also: 'men rynge aukewarde, on sonne en bransle.' Assuming the loss of l, badger can hardly be anything but a de-AWN, l. 3. For agun read agune; the form really given in the rivative of Old F. blaage, which means both "store of corn" and

AWN, l. 3. For agun read agune; the form really given in the passage cited is the pl. agunes. We also find awene, awne, Prompt. Parv. p. 18. The cognate Gk. word is  $a\chi va$ , which comes nearer to it than  $a\chi vpov$ .

AWORK. Stratmann says: 'not set awork, but only a work, occurs in Shakespeare.' This is hypercritical; as a fact, aworke occurs in the first folio, in Troil. v. 10. 38, which I actually cite; in the other three passages which I cite, it occurs as a-worke. Thus the criticism fails in all four instances; I do not know what is meant by it.

*AYAH, a nativewaiting-maid, in India. (Port., -L.) The spelling answers more nearly to the Span. aya, a governess, fem. of ayo, a tutor, but the word was certainly introduced into India by the Portuguese; the final h is an E. addition. - Port. aia, a nurse, governess; fem. of aio, a tutor of a young nobleman. Origin uncertain; Diez imagines it to be of Germanic origin; Wackernagel (with greater probability) suggests Lat. awa, by-form of awa, a grandmother, allied to awas, a grandfather. See Uncle. Minsheu's Span. Dict. (1623) has aya, 'a nurse, schoolmistresse.'

AZURE. Rather (Arab., – Pers.) than (Arab.). The Arab. lajuard is merely borrowed from Pers. lijaward or lijnward, 'lapis lazuli, a blue colour;' Rich. Dict. p. 1251. The mines of Lajward (whence the name) are situate in Turkestan, N. of the Hindoo Koosh, and N.E. of Cabul.

BABBLE. Otherwise, babble may be taken as the frequentative of blab; see under Bubble. Since bab, blab, are of imitative origin, it makes little difference. Cf. G. pappeln.

BACHELOR. The derivation from uacca is that given by Diez; but it is by no means sure. Scheler remarks: 'Other etymologists, perhaps rightly, start from the Celtic [Welsh] back, little, young, whence were naturally derived the old terms backele, backelette, young girl, maid, baceller, to make love, also to begin an apprenticeship. Backele, in its turn would have produced the form backelette. Chevallet says that the Picard baichot, and in Franche-Comté paichan, are still used to mean a little boy.' I may add that bacele, bacelette, a young girl, and baceller (verb) will be found in Roquefort; who also gives bacele in the sense of a piece of land, as much as twenty oxen could plough in a day, and thence deduces the word bacheler, a young man. The derivation remains, in fact, unsettled.

a young man. The derivation remains, in fact, unsettled. BACKGAMMON. Wedgwood remarks that 'his etymology is something more than a guess;' because the game is played on a tray-shaped board, and the word blot, used in the game, i. Danish; see Blot (2). But it is remarkable that back, a tray, does not seem to appear either in Middle or provincial English (except, that in London, a back means a large brewer's tub); and it seems to me very doubtful if the game was originally played on 'a tray-shaped' board. On the contrary, it was called 'tables,' and I suppose that these 'tables,' or flat boards, had originally no protecting rim or ridge at the edge. I strongly suspect that Strutt is quite right, when he says, in his Sports and Pastimes, bk. iv. c. 2.516, that 'the words are perfectly Saxon, as bac and gamen, i. e. Back-Game; so denominated because the performance consists in the players bringing their men back from their antagonists' tables into their own; or because the pieces are sometimes taken up and obliged to go back, that is, re-enter at the table they came from.' I object to the former of these solutions, because the men are not brought back, but forward; but the latter solution is highly probable. The word would then be wholly English; not a hybrid form. BACON. Stratmann says the M.H.G. form is bache, not backe;

BACON. Stratmann says the M. H. G. form is bache, not backe; Wackernagel gives both forms.

BAD. Section  $\delta$ , which was merely a guess, should be cancelled. It is hardly worth while to discuss further this difficult and muchdisputed word.

BADGER, subst. Mr. Nicol's note upon this word is as follows. 'This word, which originally meant "corndealer," is generally derived from the now obsolete F. bladier, with the same sense. Mätzner and E. Müller remark that this derivation offers serious phonetic difficulties; in fact, not only is there the loss of l, which is not unexampled, but there is the consonantification of the i of the O. F. diphthong ié to dzh, a change of which no instance is known, though O. F. words with ié are very common in English. An even more serious difficulty, already pointed out in the Romania (1879, v. 8, p. 436)—I presume by Prof. G. Paris, not by Mr. Wedgwood—is that bladier, like many other words in Cotgrave, is a Provençal form, and consequently could not have got into Mid. Engl.; the real French word is blaier (Cotgr. blayer), of which Mod. F. blaireau, "badger" (the animal), is a diminutive. Now blaier would have given Mid. E. blayeer, blair has anything to do with the Scotch name Blair, I do not know, but it clearly is not badger. Assuming the loss of l, badger can hardly be anything but a derivative of Old F. blaage, which means both "store of corn" and "tax on corn." I do not find an Old F. blaagier recorded, but at probably existed, especially as there is, I think, no trace of the simple substantive (which would have been blage) in Engl.; the word, transliterated (or rather trans-sonated) into Latin, would be ablātāticārium. It is very possible that examples of an Old F. word blaagier, and of a Mid. E. form blager, may yet be found; in any case the ordinary derivation from Prov. bladier (= Lat. ablāttārium) is historically and phonetically impossible."—H. Nicel. Mr. Wedgwood points out that there is actual evidence for a behet that the badger does lay up a store of corn. Herrick (ed. Haulitt, p. 468) calls him the 'gray farmer,' alluding to his store of corn.

Chipping the mice filcht from the bin

Of the gray farmer.' King Oberon's Palace. I see little difficulty in supposing that the Southern F. form bladier (given by Godefroy) may have reached us; indeed, we actually find the Anglo-F. form blader, a corn-dealer, both in the Liber Albus, p. 460, and the Liber Custumarum, p. 303. Still, badger answers better to an O. F. blaagier; and either way we are led back to the Low Lat. ablatum, as already shewn. I may add that bager, a corn-dealer, occurs in Eng. (idds, p. 424; and, spelt badger, in the Percy Folio MS., ii. 205; see Mätzner. Mr. Palmer's proposal to identify badger with some M. E. form of buyer is, in any case, utterly untenable.

BAFFLE. May be simply described as (Scand.). Jamieson also gives bachle, as a variant of bauchle, which is much to the purpose.

BAG. 'Bulga, balge oble bylge'; Wright's Voc. ii. 12 (11th century). BAGATELLE. Not (F., - Ital.), but (F., - Ital., - Teut.).

BAILS. But we also find Low L. badallum, a gag; which makes it probable that the etymology of baillon is from Low L. badare, to gape, open the mouth, because a gag keeps the mouth open (Scheler). See Aboyanco. Whether this really helps us to the etymology of bails, I cannot say. See also bail (1) in Godefroy.

BAIT. Add: So also Swed. beta. to bait. graze, feed, causal or bita, to bite; bete, pasture, grazing, also a bait; Dan. bed, a bait. The Icel. beita, to bait, is formed from beit, pt. t. of bita, to bite.

BAIZE. So also bays, i.e. baize, in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 235 (about 1502).

*BAKSHISH, BACKSHEESH, a present, small gratuity. (Pers.) Pers. bakkshish, a present. gratuity, drink money; Rich. Dict. p. 247; also bakkshish, id., and in Palmer, Pers. Dict. col. 72. Cf. Pers. bakk, part, share, bakkshidan, to give, bestow; bakksah, bakkshi, a portion. Allied to Zend baksh, to distribute, baji, tribute, Ski. bhaj, to divide; Fick, i. 381 (VBHAG).

*BALAS-RUBY, a variety of ruby, of a pale rose red, or inclining to orange. (F., - Low Lat., - Arab., - Pers.) Formerly balais, balays. Palsgrave has 'balays, a prescious stone, bal'.' Cotgrave explains F. balay as 'a balleis ruby.' - F. balais, a balas-ruby (Littré); O. F. balais, balai (id.); also balay, balé, as above. - Low Lat. balascius, balascus, balasius, balassus. balagius, a balas-ruby (Ducange). Cf. Ital. balascio, Span. balax. - Arab. balakhsh, a ruby (given by Devic, Supp. to Littré, q.v.) - Pers. badakhshá, a ruby (given because found at Badakhshán, or Badakhshán, 'the name of a country between India and Khurásán from whence they bring rubies; ' Rich. Dict. p. 249. Badakhshan lies to the N. of the river Amoo (Oxus), and to the E. of a line drawn from Samarcand to Cabul; see Black's Atlas. The change from d to l is precisely the change found in Lat. lacrima for dacrima. Cf. Malagay with Madagascar.

BALE (1). We even find the spelling balle in English; as in 'a balle bokrom,' a bale of buckram, Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 206. On the other hand, we find the Anglo French bale, Stat. of the Realm, i 218 (about A.D. 1284).

BALK (1). Stratmann gives the Icel. form as balki; I copy bilkr from Vigfusson. BALLAST. 'Balast of a shyppe, lestage;' Palsgrave. In giving

BALLAST. 'Balast of a shyppe, lestage;' Palsgrave. In giving the etymology, I relied upon the Dan. form baglast a, being the truest form. This is untenable, for it happens that baglast is merely due to popular etymology, the word being turned into baglast (back-load) to give it a sort of sense. Molbech (Dan. Dict.) tells us that the Dan. word was formerly barlast, as in Swedish. Next, Ihre tells us that barlast was a corruption of ballast. We are thus brought back to ballast as being the oldest form; and, this being so, I at once accept Koolman's etymology, as given by me in sect. C, p. 49. That is, bal-last is bale-last, evil or worthless load, as being the unprofitable part of the cargo. See Bale (2) and Last (4).

part of the cargo. See Bale (2) and Last (4). BALM. Not  $(F_{..} - Gk_{.})$ , but  $(F_{..} - L_{..} - Gk_{.} - Heb.?)$ . The Anglo-French forms are both basme (Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, 1, 2, 4), and balme (Life of Edw. Confessor, 4,354). Both from a form balsme*, which makes the identity with balsam certain. See note below. Indian Terms, p. 57. BANDY-LEGGED. Not (F. and E.), but (F. and Scand.).

* BANGLE, a kind of bracelet. (Hind.) 'The ankles and wrists ornamented with large rings or bangles;' Archæologia, vol. viii. p. 256, an. 1787 (Davies). From Hindustani bangri, 'a bracelet, an ornament for the wrist; corruptly, a bangle; 'Wilson, Gloss, of Indian Terms, p. 59.

*BANJO, a six-stringed musical instrument. (Ital. - Gk.) A negro corruption of bandore, which occurs in Minsheu's Dict. (1627). Again, bandore is for bandora, described in Queene Elizabethes Achademy, ed. Furnivall, p. 111; Chappell's Popular Music, i. 224, ii. 776. Also written pandore: 'The cythron, the pandore, and the theorbo strike;' Drayton, Polyolbion, song 4. - Ital. pandora, pandura, 'a musical instrument with three strings, a kit, a croude, a rebecke ;' Florio. - Gk. πανδούρα, πανδουρίς, also φάνδουρα, a musical instrument with three strings (Liddell and Scott). Not a true Gk. word; Chappell says the Greeks borrowed it from the ancient Egyptians. BANK. 'Sponda, hó-banca ;' i. e. a couch ; Wright's Voc. i. 290. This authorises A.S. banca, a bench.

BANNERET. 'He is properlie called a banret, whose father was no carpet-knight, but dubbed in the field vnder the banner or ensigne ;' Stanihurst, in Holinshed's Desc. of Ireland, ed. 1808, vi. 57. The Anglo-French banere (i.e. baneré) a banneret, occurs in Polit.

 * BANSHEE, a female spirit supposed to warn families of a death. (Gaelic.)
 * In certain places the death of people is supposed to be foretold by the cries and shrieks of benchi, or the Fairies wife; Pennant Tour in Scotland, 1769, p. 205 (Jamieson). - Gael. beanshith, a banshee; lit. fairy-woman (Macleo, p. 627). – Gael. bean, a woman; sith, a fairy. The Gael. and Ir. bean = O. Irish ben, is cognate with E. quean or queen; Curtius, i. 215. The Gael sith also means 'peace;' cf. Irish sioth, peace, reconciliation; sioth, adj. spiritual, belonging to spirits or the other world; siothachan, a fairy.

BANTER. 'Occasions given to all men to talk what they please, especially the banterers of Oxford (a set of scholars so called, some M.A.), who make it their employment to talk at a venture, lye, and prate what nonsense they please; ' A. Wood, Life, Sept. 6. 1678 (Davies). Explained by 'to jest or jeer 'in Phillips, ed. 1706. BANYAN. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 123, says that the English so named the tree because the bannyans (merchants) used to adorn it according to their fancy. This explains the reason for the name more fully, and confirms the etymology.

BARGE. This word should be marked as (F., -Low Lat., -Gk., - Egypt.). See below.

BARK (1), not (F., - Gk.), but (F., - Low L., - Gk.); or per-haps (F., - Low L., - Gk., - Egyptian.). There is certainly a Coptic word bari, a boat; for which see Peyron's Lexicon. The ultimate Egyptian origin of barge, bark (1), and barque, is, consequently, almost certain.

BARK (3). Cf. also Swed. bräka, Dan. bræge, Icel brækta, to bleat (said of sheep).

BARNACLE (2). We also find Irish bairneach, barneach, a limpet. Possibly Celtic; see Ducarge, who cites Giraldus Cambrensis, so that the word (in Celtic) is of some antiquity.

BARNACLES. In Neckam's treatise De Utensilibus (12th cent.), pr. in Wright's Vocab., i. 100, the O.F. bernac occurs as a gloss upon Lat. camum. If this can be connected with E. branks, q. v., the word may prove to be Celtic, in the particular sense of 'instrument put on the nose of unruly horses.' Cf. camus, quo equi per labia coguntur domite store, barnaklys; Reliq. Antiq. i. 7. Godefroy has O.F. bernicles, an instrument of torture. But, in the sense of spectacles, we find the spelling barnikles, in Damon and Pithias, Dodsley's Old Plays, i. 279 (Davies). It is not improbable that barnacles, spectacles, from prov. F. berniques, is distinct from barnacles in the other sense; though confusior. between them was casy. BAROUCHE, I. 1. For (G., - Ital.), read (G., - Ital., - L.).

*BARRATOR, one who excites to quarrels and suits-at law. (F.) Spelt barrator, barater, in Blount's Nomo Lexicon; baratoure in Prompt. Parv. p. 115; see Way's note. The pl. barratours, de-ceivers, is in the F. text of Mandeville, Trav. p. 160, note f. From M. E. barat, fraud, Ayenbite of Inwyt, pp. 39, 61, 82; barete, strife, R. Manning, tr. of Langtoft, p. 274; baret, Ancren Riwle, p. 172. The Anglo-French pl. barettours occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 364. an. 1361; and barat, deceit in Life of Edw. Confessor, ed. Luard, 1.36. - F. barat, 'cheating, deceit, guile, also a barter;' Cotgrave. See

Barter, p. 53. BARRICADE. Generally given as (F., - Ital.); rather (F., -Span, -C.). Florio has baricata, barricada, 'a barricado.' Bar-

BALSAM. Perhaps a Semitic word. Cf. Heb. básám, balsam. <sup>4</sup> ricada looks like a borrowing from Spanish; and it is important to BAMBOO. The Canarese word is banbu; Wilson, Gloss. of notice that there does not seem to be an Ital. sb. barrica, from which the verb could be made ; whereas, in Spanish, barrica is a barrel.

BARTER. Littré also suggests a Celtic origin, but refers to a different set of words. Cf. Irish brath, treachery, bradach, roguish, brathaim, I betray, Gael. brath, advantage by unfair means, treason, bradag, thievish; W. brad, treason, braau, to plot.

*BASHAW, the same as Pasha, which see (p. 424). Marlowe has basso, I Tamerlane, iii. 1. I. ' Bachat, a Bassa, a chief commander under the great Turk; Cot. BASIL (1). Not  $(F_{.,} - Gk.)$ , but  $(F_{.,} - L_{.,} - Gk.)$ . *BASIL (3). the hide of a sheep tanned.  $(F_{.,} - Span., - Arab.)$ Halliwell gives bassell lether, mentioned in the Brit. Bibliographer, by Sir E. Bridges (1810). ii. 399. The form is corrupt, l being put for n; Johnson observes that a better spelling is basen. The Anglo-French form is bazene. bazeyne, Liber Custumarum, pp. 83, 84 ; also bazain, bazein, Gloss. to Liber Albus. - O. F. basanne, given by Pals-grave as the equivalent of a 'schepskynne towed,' i.e. a tawed sheep-skin; bazane, Cotgrave; mod. F. basane. - Span, badana, a dressed sheep skin. - Arab. bitanat, the [inner] lining of a garment ; Rich Dict. p. 276; because basil-leather was used for lining leathern garments. A rab. root baland and, to cover, hide (Freytag). Cf. Arab. bain, the belly, interior part, Rich. Dict. p. 277; Heb. beien (spelt with teth), the belly. See Littré; also Devic, Supplement to Littré; and Engelmann.

*BASNET, BASSENET, BASSINET, a kind of light helmet. (F., - C.) Spelt bassenet in Halliwell, who gives several examples. M. E. basinet, Rich. Cuer de Lion, 403; bacynet, id. 5266. - O. F. bacinet (Burguy, Roquefort); spelt bassinet in Cot., who explains it by 'a small bason, also a head peece.' Dimin. of O. F. bacin, a basin; see Basin.

BASTARD. Scheler remarks that the great antiquity of the phr. fils de bast goes far to prove the etymology. He also cites from Burguy the precisely parallel O. F. form coitrart, a bastard, lit. son of a mattrass,' from coitre, a mattrass or quilt (see Quilt), and G. bankart, the same, lit. 'son of a bench,' G. bank. These instances are, to me, quite convincing. BASTILE, BASTION, BATTLEMENT. Diez refers these words to Gk. Baorágeir, to support, not to G. bast, bast. Accordingly, he separates the O.F. bast, a pack-saddle, from G. bast. The matter is as yet hardly settled.

BATTEN(1). Cf. also Swed. bdtnad, profit, advantage; from bdta, to profit. But these forms have a different vowel-sound, and are more closely allied to Icel. bæta than to batna.

BATTERY. The Anglo-French baterie, a beating (as in the legal phr. assault and battery) occurs in the Stat. of the Realm. i. 48, an. 1278.

BAULK, the same as BALK, q. v.

BAY (3), an inlet of the sea; a recess.  $(F_{..}-L_{.})$  There is great difficulty about this word. (1) We are certain that bay (of the sea) is from F. baie, with the same sense, of which word Littre gives no history. (2) We are certain that bay (in a building) is from F. baie, used as an architectural term. The difficulty is rather with the French words. My former view was that the words are identical. and I referred both to the Low Lat. baia, of which not much is known. Littré separates the words, referring baie (in architecture) to the F. bayer, to gape; whilst baie, a gulf, is supposed by him to be connected with the Latin Baiæ. Whether the words are really connected is a doubtful point; but, if we approach the etymology on the easier side first, we may at once decide (with Littré and Scheler) that the architectural term, spelt base in the twelfth century, is from the verb bayer, to gape, and meant, originally, 'an opening,' and hence, the space between the arches in a building, a division or partition; cf. prov. E. bay, a partition in a barn, &c (see Halliwell). In fact, we find the Anglo-French base, with the very sense of 'gap,' in Philip de Thaun, Livre des Creatures, l. 38. The F. bayer, O. F. baer, answers to Ital. badare. Prov. badar, to wait expectantly, orig. 'to gape idlie vp and downe' (Florio); all from a Low Lat. badare, to gape. The Ital. stare a bada, to stand with open mouth, cited by Diez, suggests that the verb is of onomatopoetic origin; from the syllable ba, expressive of gaping. This view is taken by Diez, Scheler, and Littré. β. Next, we should note that the O. F. base represents Low. Lat. badata, and was orig. the fem. of the pp. signifying 'wide open,' and hence 'an opening.' This clears up the architectural sense of bay, and entirely agrees with Wedgwood's remarks, whose correction of my article I thankfully acknowledge. But Wedgwood asks us to go further, and to explain bay, a gulf, in a like manner. Scheler seems to incline to the same view, but remarks that, if so, Isidore of Seville should have used the form badia, not baia, when he said: 'Hunc portum ueteres uocabant Baias.' However, the Catalan form of bay is really badia (see Diez)

We may either suppose Baias in Isidore to be a corruption of badias, or we may suppose (with Littre) that Baias is merely copied from the Lat. Baiæ, in which case it is even possible that this Baias is nothing but a place-name, and has but little to do with the question. I now feel inclined to accept Wedgwood's explanation to the full, merely putting a slight difference of form between badia, a gulf, a derivative from bad-are with suffix -ia. and badata, a bay of a building, the fem. of the pp. of the same verb. To the form 'We may badia may be assigned the same orig. sense of 'opening.' specially note the application to the embouchure or outlet of a river, which may conversely be regarded as an inlet of the sea: [as in] Telement exploiterent que en la bee du fleuve de Albule furent arrivez' (Godefroy).-Wedgwood, Contested Etymologies. Koolman, in his E. Friesic Dict., p. 78, takes precisely the same view, deriving bay, in both senses, from badare. BAYONET. The word, as Richardson points out, occurs as early as in Cotgrave, who has: 'Bayonnette, a kinde of small flat pocket dagger, furnished with knives; or a great knife to hang at the girdle like a dagger.' Hence the usual story, that they were first made at Bayonne about 1650, cannot be correct. The etymology, from Bayonne (accepted both by Littré and Scheler) may still be right; but it is clear that the word at first meant a kind of dagger independent of a gun. The first edition of Cotgrave was that of 1611. There is a good note upon the word in N. and Q. 3 S. xii. 287.

BDELLIUM. Rather (L., -Gk., -Skt.). Lat. bdellium. -Gk. βδέλλιον; also βδέλλα (Liddell and Scott). Other forms are βδολχόν, μαδέλκον, which Lassen derives from a supposed Skt. madalaka\*, from Skt. mada, musk. With  $\beta \delta_{0\lambda} \chi \delta r$  cf. Heb. bedó-lakk; see Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed.—A. L. M.

BE. For 'Gael. bi, to exist,' read 'Gael. bu, was;' and for 'W. byw, to live, exist,' read 'W. bod, to be.' BEACH. Etym. doubtful. The following is curious; Trevisa,

tr. of Higden, vii. 135, says that Canute placed his chair on the 'banke of the see,' Lat. in littore maris. Cf. 'we haled your barke ouer a barre of beach or pebble stones into a small river;' Hack-luyt, Voyages, i. 355. Ihre particularly notes that the O. Swed. backe means not only 'hill,' but 'bank of a stream;' Rietz explains Icel. bakki by (1) bank (2) brink of a stream. I still incline to the opinion that it is a 16th cent. corruption of the Scand. word for bank.' Halliwell gives 'baich, a languet [tongue] of land, Ray;' but I cannot find it in Ray's Glossary. The Shropsh. baitch or batch means a valley, and is the same as M. E. bach in Stratmann;

this can hardly be the same word, the sense being quite unsuitable. BEADLE. For (E.), read (F., -M. H. G.). Certainly not English; but a French form. The A.S. bydel [not bydel, as printed] would only have given a M.E. form budel or bidel. Both these forms, in fact, occur; budel in the Owl and Nightingale, 1167; bidel in the Ormulum, 633, 9189, 9533. Bedel is a later form, borrowed from O. F. bedel (later bedeau, as in Cotgrave). - M. H. G. butel (mod. G. buttel), a beadle; O. H. G. putil. - O. H. G. put-, stem of the pt. t. pl. of piulan, piolan, to offer, shew, proclaim, cognate with A. S. beddan, to bid, proclaim; see Bid (2). In precisely the same way the A.S. bydel is derived (by vowel-change of u to y) from bud-on, pt. t. pl. of beodan, to bid. The adoption of O.F. bedel in place of the native word is remarkable. This O.F. bedel was Latinised as bedellus, whence the term esquire bedell, as used in

Cambridge University. BEAGLE. M.E. begle, Squire of Low Degree, 771. It is printed as bogelle in Wright's Voc. i. 251, col. 1, which looks like a mistake for begelle. REAKER. So also Swed. bägare, Dan. bæger, a beaker; being likewise borrowed though these forms are of small value, being likewise borrowed from Low Latin.

BEAR (2), l. 2. Dele Lat. fera, which is cognate with E. deer. BEARD, l. 1. Dele berde ; the M. E. form is berd.

*BEAVER (3), BEVER, a potation, short intermediate repast. (F.,-L.) 'Arete. What, at your bever, gallants?' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Act iv. M. E. beuer (=bever), 'drinkinge tyme, Biberrium;' Prompt. Parv. - O. F. (Anglo-French) beivre, a drink, Gaimar's Chron. 1. 5868; pl. beveres, id. 1. 5994. Merely the sub-stantival use of O. F. bevre, to drink. - Lat. bibere, to drink. For similar examples of infin. moods as sbs., cf. leisure, pleasure, attainder, ¶ Quite distinct from beaver (2). It is still in use; remainder. Clare speaks of 'the bevering hour,' in his Harvest Morning, st. 7. KON. See Luke i. 22, where we find the A.S. pres. part.

and the Port. bahia, a bay, points back to the same form. Minsheu's BED. In Chaucer, C. T. 295, or in the six-text edition, 293, the Span. Dict. (1623) has 'Baia, or Bahia, or Baya, a bay, or creeke.' form used is beddes, gen. case. The nom. is bed, Ayenbite of Inwyt. p. 31, l. 13.

*BEDELL; see remarks upon Beadle (above).

BEDLAM. Bethlehem means 'house of bread.'-Heb. beth. house : lekhem (kh = G. ch), bread.

BEDRIDDEN, l. 6. The reference is to Earle's first edition; in the second edition the suggestion is withdrawn. We find M E. bedreden even in the singular, in Hampole, Pricke of Conscience, l. 808. It was prob. then already mistaken for a pp.

BEECH, I. I. For 'M.E. beech,' read 'M.E. beche,' which is the form given, in the passage referred to, in Tyrwhitt's edition; beech being a mere misprint. The A.S. béce is not 'unauthenticated'; we find ' Fagus, béce' in Wright's Vocab. i. 285, col. 1, as is pointed out in Stratmann's Dictionary. I also find 'Esculus, bece,' id. ii. 20 (11th cent.).

BEEFEATEB. It occurs in the Spectator, no. 625 (1714); and in the old play of Histriomastix, iii. 1.99; see Simpson, School of Shakespeare, ii. 47. The word is wrongly marked (E.), as it is a hybrid. It is to be particularly observed that the word 'loaf-eater' to signify a servant occurs even in Anglo-Saxon! So little is it a new term. 'Gif man ceorlæs hláf-ætan ofslæhð'=if any one slays a churl's loaf-eater; Laws of King Æthelberht, § 25; in Thorpe's Anc. Laws, i. 8. Mr. Thorpe notes: 'lit. the loaf-eater, and consequently a domestic or menial servant."

BEGUINE; p. 58, 1. 18. By the expression '-alt is an O.F. suffix that is interchangeable with -ard,' I merely mean to compare -alt and -ard as to their use and force. Etymologically, they are of different origin, being allied, respectively, to G. wald, power, and hart. hard.

*BEGUM, in the E. Indies, a lady of the highest rank. (Pers., -Turk. and Arab.) Rich. Pers. Dict. p. 284, gives Pers. begum, a queen, lady of rank; also queen-mother, respectable matron. 'Queen mother' seems to be the orig. sense, as Devic explains that the word is compounded of Turk. beg or bey, a bey, governor, and Arab. um or umm, mother; so that it is lit. 'mother of the governor.' The Arab. umm, mother, is in Rich. Dict. p. 162. And see Bey. ¶ Another derivative of bey is the title beglerbeg, given to the governor of a province; see Massinger, Renegado, iii. 4. In Sandys' Travels (1632), we read of 'the Beglerbegs, the name signifying a lord of lords;' p. 47. This explanation is correct; begler or beyler signifying lords, and beg or bey, a lord. BEHAVE. Cf. also 'the whiche...behauyd kym relygyously,'

Monk of Evesham, c. 47, p. 95; 'Wyth an enarrabulle gestur and behaving of gladnes'; id. c. 19, p. 47. Also: 'Behavour, mainties;'

Palsgrave. BEHEMOTH. Not really a Heb. word, but only connected being the secondar etymology. It is of with Heb. behemáh, a beast, by a popular etymology. It is of Egyptian origin ; from P-ehe-mau-t, the hippopotamus ; see Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed. p. 97; Delitzsch, on Isaiah, xxx. 6; Smith, Bible Dict. s. v.—A. L. M.

BELFRY. An early use of O.F. bierfrois as a tower for bells, has been kindly pointed out to me. 'Definiendo, quod campana, seu campanæ, et campanile, quod bierfrois dicitur'; Constitutio, [dated] Nov. 7, 1226; in Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae, Legg. ii. 257. The change of r to l is so common that it clearly took place, in the first instance, without any influence upon it of the word bell; indeed, the form belfrid (for berefrid) occurs even in German, and is given by Lexer (N. and Q. 6 S. v. 430). Confusion with bell, how-ever, fixed its present sense.  $\beta$ . The etymology of M. H. G. berefrid or bercurit is not given quite correctly at p. 59. It is not a compound of two nouns, but of a verb and noun, like E. daredevil. The derivation, as given by Wackernagel, is from berg-en, to protect, guard, and M. H. G. writ or frid (O. H. G. fridu, G. friede), peace, or rather personal security, which is the first sense of Icel. frior. Thus the sense was 'protecting personal safety,' or 'affording pro-tection;' hence, a guard-tower, &c. The word has been tediously discussed; see N. and Q. 6 S. v. 104, 158, 189, 271, 297, 429, &c. The second syllable is from the same source as the second syllable in affray. See Frith.

BELT. The A.S. belt appears in a Glossary pr. in Mone's Quellen und Forschungen, Aachen, 1830, p. 341, where we find: 'baltheus, belt.' Also: 'Balteum, gyrdel, odde belt;' Wright's Voc. ii. 11 (11th cent.).

* BEND (2). a slanting band, in heraldry; one of the nine ordinaries. (F.,-G.) Spelt bende in Book of St. Albans (1486), pt. ii., leaf e 1. Not an E. word, but from O. F. bende, which was a modification of bande. The Anglo-French bende, in the heraldic sense, occurs in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 434. Cotgrave gives bende, the same as bande; and assigns 'a bend in armory' as being one meaning of bande. The M. E. bende also meant a fillet; see Cath. Anglicum, p. 27, note 7; and 'fillet' is another meaning assigned by Cotgrave to bande. Roque whence also A.S. breówan, to brew, briw, broth, broč, broth, fort also gives O.F. bende as meaning bande, bandeau.'-G. band, a breád, bread, bród, a brood, bredan, to breed, &c.; see Fick, iii. band, string, fillet, bond. - G. band, pt. t. of binden, to bind; see Band (2). Der. bend-let, from F. bendelette, the same as bandelette (Cotgrave); dimin. of bande.

* BENZOIN, a resinous substance. (F., - Span., - Arab.) Spelt benzoine in Lingua, iv. 3, in Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, ix. 419 (1607). Called also gum benzoin, and (by a singular popular etymology) gum Benjamin. Phillips (1706) calls it 'benjamin or benzoin.' - F. benjoin, 'the aromaticall gumme, called benjamin or benzoin;' Cotgrave. The n seems to be a F. addition; Cotgrave also notes that benjoin Français meant ' the hearbe maisterwort, or false pellitory o Spain ;' shewing that benjoin was not a F. word, but Spanish. - Span. benjui, benjamin or benzoin, gum-resin; 'Neuman. Shewn by Engelmann and Dozy (and approved by Devic) to be a corruption (dropping the first syllable) of the Arab. name for benzoin, which was lubán jáwi, lit. Javanese frankincense. Perhaps lu- was confused with the Span. fem. def. art. la. The Arab. lubán means frankincense, benzoin; Rich. Dict. p. 1256; whilst jawi means belonging to Java, Javanese. Benzoin really comes from Sumatra, but Devic says that the Arabs regarded Java as a name for that island also. With Arab. lubán, cf. Heb. levónáh, frankincense, from the root lávan, to be white (whence Gk. AlBaros).

The original of Gk. Bhoullos may be the Skt. BERYL. vaidúrya. 'Vaidúrya has been recognised as the original of the Greek Bhpullos, a very ingenious conjecture, either of Weber's or of Pott's, considering that lingual d has a sound akin to r, and ry may be changed to ly and ll (Weber, Omina, p. 326). The Pers. billawr or ballur, which Skeat gives as the etymon of Bhpullos, is of Arabic origin, means crystal, and could hardly have found its way into Greek at so early a time;' Selected Essays, by Max Müller, 1881, ii 352.

* BESANT, BEZANT, a golden circular figure, in heraldry. F., -L., -Gk.) Intended to represent a gold coin of Byzantium. M. E. besant, Gower, C. A. ii. 191; Wycliffe, Matt. xxv. 25. - O. F. besant, 'an ancient gold coin;' Cot. - Low Lat. byzantium, acc. of byzantius, a besant, coin of Byzantium. - Lat. Byzantium. - Gk. Bu-Sárrior, the old name of Constantinople.

BESTEAD. Add: So also Swed. stadd, circumstanced; vara stadd i fara, to be in danger; &c.

BEVEL. Mod. F. biveau (Littré).

*BEVER, a potation; see Beaver (3) above. BEVERAGE. It occurs in M. E.; in Mandeville, Trav. p. 141; Spec. of Engl. ii. 170, l. 56. Cf. O. F. bevrage, s. v. Breuvage in Littré.

BEVY. In the Book of St. Albans (1485), leaf f 6, we find: 'A beny of Ladies, A beny of Roos [roes], A beny of Quaylis.' Also 'a bevy of roos,' Reliq. Antiq. i. 154.

BLAS. Add: if this be right, the etymology is from bi-, double; and facies, a face. So Scheler. BIBLE. Not (F., - L., - Gk.), but (F., - L., - Gk., - Egyptian).

The Gk.  $\beta b \beta \lambda os$ , papyrus, is not a Gk. word, but borrowed from Egyptian. I suspect it is nothing but a debased spelling of the very word papyrus itself. The weakening of p to b, and the change of r to l, are very common phenomena. BID (1). Add: So also Swed. bedja, to pray, pt. t. bad; Dan. bede, to pray, pt. t. bad. BID (2). So also Icel. bjóða, to bid, pt. t. bauð ; Swed. bjuda, Dan. byde; &c.

*BIGGIN, BIGGEN, a night-cap. (F.) In Shak. 2 Hen. IV, iv. 5. 27. - O. F. beguin, 'a biggin for a child;' Cot. He also gives beguiner, to put on a biggin. Palsgrave has: 'Bigganne, a woman that lyveth chaste;' and 'Byggen, for a chyldes heed;' for both words he gives F. beguine. Doubtless named from a resem-blement the age word by the superstilled Birling when a Correspondence of the superstant of the superstilled Birling when a correspondence of the superstant of the sup blance to the caps worn by the nuns called Beguines, who, as Cotgrave remarks, 'commonly be all old, or well in years.' See Beguine.

The biggin also occurs as a spelling of piggin. BIGHT, M. E. bigt, a bend; spell bygt, Gawain and the Grene Knight, 1349. 'The bygt of the harme,' i.e. bend of the arm, Reliq. Antiq. i. 190. The A.S. form is byAt, but this only occurs in a vague and extended sense; see Grein. The modern sense is due to Scand. influence BIGOT. The view here advocated was combated by Mr. Wedgwood in a letter which appeared in the Academy, Aug. 9, 1879; see a long article on the word in his Contested Etymologies.

BILLION. To be marked as (F., -L.). The word was coined in the 16th century, and, apparently, in France; see Littré. Cot-grave has the word, explained by 'a million of millions.'

BIRD. Stratmann challenges the derivation of A.S. brid or bridd from bredan; but I do not give that derivation. I merely suggest a connection; and I still hold that the Teut. base is BRU,

BISSON. Dr. Stratmann well suggests that the right form of the A.S. word is bisene, not a corruption of the pres. part. biseond, but a correct form; compounded of bi, prefix, and the A.S. sone, visible, manifest, clear, usually written gesine or gesene (the prefix ge-making little difference); see Grein, i. 462. Thus bisene would mean 'clear when near at hand,' hence short-sighted. The A.S. gesyne is allied to seon, to see.

BIT, (1) and (2). Bit (1) is A.S. bita, masc., gen. bitan; but A.S.bite, gen. bites, is mod. E. bite (Stratmann). As to the former, cf. 'æfter þam bitan,' after the bit (morsel), John xiii. 27; 'Frustum, bita,' Wright's Voc. ii. 151. BITCH. 'Canicula, bicce;' Wright's Voc. ii. 23 (11th cent.).

BITTERN. Cf. Lat. butire, bubere, to cry as a bittern ; baubari, to yelp. Almost certainly of imitative origin.

BIZARRE. Spelt bizarr, Gentleman Instructed, p. 559, 10th ed. 1732 (Davies); also in North's Examen, 1740, p. 31. Probably from Basque bizar, a beard; so that Span. bizarro may have meant bearded, and hence valiant ; just as Span. bigote means a moustache, but hombre de bigote means a man of spirit and vigour.

BLACKGUARD. In the Accounts of St. Margaret, Westminster, p. 10, under the date 1532, we find: 'item, received for iiij, torches of the black guard, viijd.;' see Brand's Popular Antiquities, ed. Ellis, ii. 316. In Like Will to Like (1568), pr. in Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, iii. 323, we find: 'Thou art served as Harry Hangman, captain of the black guard.' The quotation from Stani-burst at b for oil a in form = 6% of a for 16 (12) hurst at p. 65, col. 2, is from p. 68 of vol. 6 (ed. 1808). BLAIN. For A. S. blegen, see A. S. Leechdoms, i. 280, l. 1;

ii. 128. l. 21.

BLAME. Not  $(F_{.,-}G_{k.})$ , but  $(F_{.,-}L_{.,-}G_{k.})$ .

BLARE. Cf. O. Du. blaren, 'to lowe as a cowe; 'Hexham. BLASPHEME. Not (Gk.), but (L., -Gk.).

BLAST. So also Swed. bldst, wind, blowing weather; bldsa, to blow. Widegren also has the form blast, a blast or gust of wind.

BLAZE. In Mone's Quellen und Forschungen, we find in a glossary the entries: 'facula, blæs' (sic), p. 402; 'faculá [abl.], blasan,' p. 351; 'flammæ, blasen' (pl.), p. 393; 'faculis, blæsum,' p. 403. Note also: 'Lampas, blasen' (pl.), p. 393; 'faculis, blæsum,' p.

BLEB, BLOB. In the Book of St. Albans (1484), leaf c 6, back, we find : 'When thou seeth (sic) thy hauke vppon his mouth and his chekis blobbed [puffed out], then she hath thys sekenes called Agrum.' * BLINDMAN'S BUFF. 'To play at blindman buff;' Ran dolph, Works, p. 394 (1651), ed. Hazlitt (cited by Palmer). It is mentioned earlier, in the Prol. to The Return to Parnassus (1606). And, in 1598, Florio explains Ital. minda by 'a play called hoodman blind, blind hob, or blindman buffe. Here buff is the F. buffe, 'a buffet, blow, cuffe, box, whirret, on the eare,' &c.; Cotgrave. From. O F. bufe (a word widely spread); see further under Buffet (1). The explanation is given by Wedgwood as follows :- 'In West Flanders buf is a thump; buffen, to thump, buf spelen, a game which is essentially blindman's buff without the bandaging of the eyes. One player is made the butt of all the others, whose aim is to strike him on the back without his catching them. When he catches the boy who gave him the last buffet, he is released and the other takes his place. See De Bo, West-Flemish Dict.' See also Koolman, East-Frisian Dict., who quotes the phrase dat geid up'n blinden buf, that is, done (lit. goes) at hap-hazard (lit. at blind buff). And see buf in Diez. BLITHE. So also Du. blijde, blijd, blij, glad, cheerful; Dan. and Swed, blid, mild, gentle. The connection with blink is doubtful. Dele section B of this article. The Teut. type is BLITHA, Fick, iii. 222. Root unknown.

BLOT (2). The expression 'made a blot,' with reference to the game of 'tables,' occurs in Dryden, Wild Gallant, Act i. sc. 3.

BLOTCH. Add: Cockayne renders A. S. blace (dat. case) by 'blotch ;' see A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 8, 1. 1. Blotch might answer to an A. S. verb blacian, formed from blac, black. Indeed, Ettmüller gives blacian, with two references, but he has been misled; in both places, the word is blacian, to grow bleak or pale; see Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 154, l. 7; p. 212, l. 7. But cf. Du. blaken, to scorch.

BLUDGEON. As the word is rare, I note the occurrence of: Corn. blogon (with g as j), a bludgeon, in the Cornish miracle-play De Origine Mundi, l 2709; see Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 148. BLUNDER-BUSS. 'Blunderbus, which seems to be a later name for the old harquebus, which was fired from a rest fixed in the ground, is not probably (as generally stated) a corruption of Dutch donderbus, G. donnerbückse, but another form of the word blanter-bus. Blanter-bus seems originally to have been plantier-bus, a derivative doubtless of Lat. plantare, F. planter, Ital. plantare, denoting the 3 É

King James, in 1617, granted the gunmakers a charter empowering them to prove all arms - ' harquesbusse (plantier-busse, alias blanterbusse) and musquettoon, and every calliver, musquet, carbine,' &c., Original Ordnance Accounts, quoted by Sir S. D. Scott, The British Army, vol. i. p. 405.' – Palmer, Folk-Etymology. Cf. 'het geschut planten, to plant ordnance;' Hexham. If this be so, blunder- is from Lat. plantare; see Plant. The syllable -bus is explained at p. 68. BLUNT. The derivation given is much strengthened by the early occurrence of the word in the Ormulum with the sense of 'dull of sight, and in close connection with blind. Moreover, the Ormulum contains many words of Scand. origin. 'Forr unnwis mann iss blunnt and blind off herrtess eshe sihhpe:' i.e. for the unwise man is dull and blind of the eye-sight of his heart; Orm. 16954. This quotation is given by Mätzner, who adopts the etymology which I have already given. The author of the Prompt. Parv. seems to have recognised the common origin of blunt and blunder. He gives: Blunderer, or blunt warkere [worker], hebefactor, hebeficus; and Blunderer, or blunt warkere [worker], nebelactor, nebencus; and "Blunderynge, or blunt warkynge, hebefaccio." BLUSH, 1. 3. It answers still better to A.S. blyscan, to glow, for which Stratmann refers us to Mone, Quellen und For-schungen (Aachen, 1830), p. 355, where we find: 'Rutilare, bliscan, blyscan.' In the phr. 'at the first blush,' i.e. at the first glance, we have the same word. See Joseph of Arimathie, 657; where Mätzner well translates blusch by G. Blick.

BLUSTER. Stratmann cites M. E. blusteren, Allit. Poems, ii. 886, P. Plowman, B. v. 521; but the sense of this verb is to wander aimlessly about, and it does not at all answer to bluster in the modern sense. It means nearly the same as blunder. But cf. E. Fries. blüstern, to bluster, from blüssen, to blow, allied to blasen, to blow * BOARD (2), verb, to go on board a ship: also to accost. (F., -Teut.) Though the sb. board is E., the verb is borrowed from F., and does not appear in M.E. It is common in Shak. in both senses; bord, to accost, is in Spenser, F. Q. ii. 2. 5, ii. 4. 24, &c.; see boord in Nares. 'At length herself bordeth Æneas thus;' Surrey, tr. of Aneid, iv. 304. 'I borde a shyppe or such lyke, Jaborde vne nasire,' Palsgrave. Short for abord, which occurs in Cotgrave. -F. aborder, 'to approach, accoast, abboord, boord, or lay aboord;' Cot. -F. a, to (= Lat. ad); and bord, edge, brim, side of a ship. - Icel. bord, Du.

boord, board, side of a ship; see Board. BOAST. Perhaps (E.). Not Celtic; the Com bost is merely borrowed from E. (Rhis). Perhaps the same may be said of the other forms. The Lowl. Sc. boist or boast means to terrify, other forms. The Lowi. Sc. bosst or boast means to terruy, intimidate; and the sb. means intimidation, being spelt bost in Wallace, x. 127, xi. 389; and boist in Douglas, tr. of Virgil (Jamie-son). In the last instance, it is printed bost (riming with ost) in Small's ed. iii. 211, l. 16. The M. E. bost means 'noise,' K. Ali-saunder, 4068; and 'pride,' Rob. of Glouc. p. 258 [not 285]; it is iso spelt boost, P. Plown, B. siv. 247 (footnote). On the whole, it seems probable that the word is E., though not found in A.S. Wedgwood compares G. pusten, to puff or blow; which see in Weigand, who connects it further with G. pausback, a person with full, puffed checks. The G. pusten is much the same as banschen, bansen, to swell, bunch out. Cf. also Swed. pust, a puff of wind, pusta, to blow, puff. The O. Swed. pust meant a pair of bellows (Ihre). In the Bremen Wörterbuch we have punsten, to blow, puster, a pair of bellows, puustig, pusig, swollen with wind, puffed out. The Du. puist means a pimple, i. e. swelling.  $\beta$ . We trace in all these an imitative  $\checkmark$  PUS, to puff, blow; whence might well have been formed Swed. pus-t, a puff of wind, M. E. boos-t, a noise, orig. an explosion of air, a crack, as Wedgwood suggests. Cf. root No. 444, p. 746. The -t is a common A. S. noun-suffix, as in E. blast, din-t, frost, thirs-t; and blast is a closely parallel formation. The sb. boast is the older formation, the verb boast being taken from it. The senses of puffing out and noisy (below). ¶ In connection with this supposed root, it deserves to be mentioned that it is discussed in Koolman's E. Friesic Wörterbuch, s. v. bossem, bosom. He proposes to derive from it the word bos-om also, as meaning 'swelling,' that which is swollen out. And I believe he is right. We should then have, from  $\checkmark$  PUS, to puff out, the derivatives PUS-A, bag (Fick, iii. 167); PUS-TA, a puff, noise, boast; and PUS-A-MA, swelling, bosom. The p and b could easily be interchanged in an imitative root of this description; cf.

buzz, birr, purr, and Gk. oboa, a blast, pair of bellows. BODE. So also Icel. boo, a bid, offer, is derived from the stem of boo-inn, pp. of bjoba, to bid. So also Swed. bud, an offer, bud, a messenger, message, are from bud-en, pp. of bjuda, to bid; and Dan. bud, a message, is from bud-et, pp. of byde, to bid. Thus the precise of bode to bid is completely made out.

firearm that is planted or fixed on a rest before being discharged. . . O'The derivation usually given, from W. bidogyn, fails, from the fact that this word is accented on the o. We may, however, consider the suffix -kin as the usual E. dimin, suffix, and then boide-, bode- (1wo syllables) may be corruptions of the Celtic word now represented by

W. bidor, Gael. biodag, Irish bideog, a dagger. *BOHEA, a kind of tea. (Chinese.) So named from the Bake hills. 'The Bon-y tcha (Bohea tea) takes its name from a mountain called Bon-y, situated in the province of Fo-kien; 'Engl. Cycl. s. v. Tea. Fo-kien is Fukian in Black's Atlas, on the S. E. coast of China.

BOIL (2). The A.S. byle occurs in a gloss. 'Fruncas, wearse [wart], byle;' Wright's Voc. ii. 151. Add Swed. boil, a boil, tumour (where the d is excrescent); also Swed. bula, a bump, swelling. All he forms cited are from a base BUL, whence Goth. afbeadjan, to puff up. The Icel. beyla, a swelling, also belongs here; since the Icel. ey (by the usual vowel change) is due to an. The mod. E. word ought rather to be bile, as it is provincially; the diphthong oi is a substitution due to confusion with the verb to boil, of F. origin. I now doubt the connection with bulge.

BOISTEROUS. Perhaps (E.); not (C.). When we find Low. Sc. boist used as another form of bost (see note on Boast above), it becomes probable that M. E. boist-nows or boist-ous is a mere extension from M. E. boost, bost, a loud noise. I now agree with Wedgwood's suggestion, and admit the justice of his criticism, that the objection to the derivation from the W. Surgetan, wild, brutal, ferocious, is not only the wide divergence of meaning, but the extreme improbability that a word of this abstract meaning should have been borrowed from the Welsh." Thus boisterous is noisy, or boast-ful (in the early sense of boast). Cf. 'Boustmousnesse, BOILE, 1. 1. The M. E. bole cited is the dat. case. Stratmann gives the nom. as bol, but without a reference. The nom. is written bole in the Destruc. of Troy, 4960.

BOLT. 'Catapultas, speru, boltas;' Wright's Voc. ii. 18 (11th cent.). The Low L. calapulta means a bolt as well as a catapalt. BOLT, BOULT, to sift meal. The M. E. pp. bulttedd ( = bulled) occurs in the Ormulum, 1 902. Wedgwood objects that 'coarse woollen cloth is wholly unfit for the process of boulting floar, which requires a thin, open fabric.' But it is rather my explanation of the F. word that is at fault. The F. bure merely meant originally 'reddish,' and may have been used for a reddish or brownish stuff of any texture. That O. F. buleter (Anglo French balter, Liber Albus, p. 705) is precisely the Ital. burattare, 'to boult or sift meale' (Florio), is clear enough. Cf. also buratto, 'a boulter or sieue.' The explanation already given seems to me sufficient; see Scheler, Diez, and Littré, who are all agreed about it. In particular, Littré adduces the O. F. buretel as being the form of bluteau found in the 13th century. Godefroy cites farine buretalee, boulted flour, A. D. 1285. And it is worth observing that the mod. F. bluter, to boult, is pronounced bulter in the Walloon dialect of Mons (Sigart).

*BOLUS, a large pill. (L., -Gk.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. He also explains it as a clod of earth, lump of metal, &c. - Low Lat. bolus (not Lat. bolus), which is merely a Latinised form of Gk. βῶλος, a clod, lump of earth, a lump (generally). Perhaps allied to Gk. γαυλός, a round vessel, and to Skt. gola, Icel. kúla, a ball. See Wharton, Etyma Græca; Fick, i. 76.

BONFIRE. When we find, in Cathol. Anglicum, A.D. 1483, the entry 'bane, os,' succeeded by 'bane-fire, ignis ossium.' and again find the spelling bane-fire in Lowland Scotch in the times of James VI., we cannot resist the conclusion that the word was understood to mean bone-fire from the time when it first appears for more than a century onwards. Palsgrave's curious spelling bonne-fyre is at once explained by his preceding entry, viz. 'Bonne of a beest, os.' The spelling bone fire occurs, not only in the extract given at p. 70, but even in passages where it has the sense of a fire made by way of rejoicing; see Fabyan, an. 1554-5. Hall, Hen. V., an. 3. In the Bible of 1551, 2 Chron. xxi. 19, bonefire translates the Lat. exercises. Cooper (see below) seems to use bonefire to signify an actual cremation of the dead. Another suggestion is sent me by a correspondent in Belgium, who says: Frequent allusion is made in Flemish to bone-fires. See Kilian, s.v. Weedoschen. When the weather happens to be very cold, one man will meet another in Bruges and say, Koud eh? Ze branden hoorns buiten de Dampoorte, people are burning horns outside the Dam-gate. Horns, bones, old shoes, used to be burnt in times of epidemics, to purify the air. I have seen it done.' Cooper's Thesaurus (1565) has : 'Pyra, a bone fier wherein mens bodies weare burned; erigere pyram, to make a bone fier.' The same spelling occurs repeatedly in passages cited in Brand's Antiquities, ed. Ellis, i. 299-311; two of these are dated (p. 309), in the 8th year of Hen. VII. and in the first year of Hen. VIII. respectively. At p. 298 he quotes from MS. Harl. 2345, art. 100 :- 'in vigilia beati Johannis, colligunt pueri in quibusdam P Flanders exactly as E. bout. Een bot regen, eene botte wind, vorst: regionibus ossa et quædam alia immunda, et in simul cremant.' In N. and Q. 3 S. i. 109, is a quotation from J. O. Daly's Poets and Poetry of Munster, i. 256, as follows: 'Deantar enaimh-theinnte agus seid stoc na pibe,' i. e. let bone-fires be made and the bag-pipe blow. Here cnaimh-theinnte is unambiguous, being a plural compound from cnamh, bone, and teinne, fire.

*BONITO, a fish of the tunny kind. (Span., - Arab.) Described in Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 133 (ab. 1565). 'A bonitoe-fish;' Minsheu (1627). - Span. bonito, 'a fish called a tunnie;' Minsheu's Span. Dict. (1623) - Arab. baynis, 'the fish called bonito;' Rich. Dict. p. 312. Here the final s of baynis is not the usual s, but the 4th letter of the alphabet which, according to Palmer, is properly sounded as E. th in both.

BOON. Wedgwood remarks: 'There is no doubt that this confusion with Fr. bon has taken place, but it is not with bon in the fundamental sense of good, but in a special application which Skeat has not noticed. Bon in Old French was used in the sense of good pleasure, what seems good to one, and thence will, desire, boon. "Se tu veus fere mon plalsir Et tout mon box et mon desir:"—Bar-bazan, Fables et Contes, iii. 8.' This makes the matter still clearer. Etymologically, there is but little difference; the sb. bon is merely Lat. bonum, neut. of bonus. Besides, there are passages in which boon is the mere adjective, as bone deserts = good deserts, Return from Parnassus, ii. 5, ed. Arber, p. 29, l. 31 (where Hazlitt prints boon deserts); so also boon sparks = fine fellows, Hazlitt's Old Plays, xii 270, a parallel phrase to boon companions. BOOT (1). Rather (F., -Low L., -Gk.). F. botte. -Low L. botta, a boot, the same word as Low L. butta, a cask, butt.-Gk. Búris, Boûris, a flask. ¶ The G. bütte or butte is merely a borrowed word from Low Latin. See Bottle (1).

BORAGE. M. E. borage (14th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 51, l. 4. Bonne, boracke; 'Palgrave. BORE (3). M. E. bare (Northern dialect) in the tomp. se-bare,

i. e. sea bore, surge; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, pt.

ii. p. 90, 1. 38. BORROW. It should have been more explicitly stated that the A. S. bork, a pledge, is derived from the stem of borg-en, pp. of beorgan, to protect. So also Du. borg is from the stem of ge-borg-en, pp. of Du. bergen, to save. BOUDOIR. Perhaps allied to Pout, q. v.

BOULT, to sift. See Bolt, p. 69; and see note on Bolt above. BOUND (2). The Breton boden, a cluster of trees, a thicket, is given in Legonidec, and is derived from Bret. bod, a tuft of trees, a cluster, clearly the same word as Irish bot, a cluster, bunch. The suggested connection with Gael. bonn and E. bottom must be given up. We find Anglo-French boundes, bounds, limits, Stat. of Realm, i. 144, an. 1305; spelt bundes, id. 138, an. 1300; bondes, Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 71. Also the verb bunder, to fix limits, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 332. Bonde = bodne, by transposition (Scheler). BOUND (3). Cf. 'boone home' = homeward-bound; An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 345. BOUQUET. To be marked as (F., - Low L., - Teut.).

BOURN. To be marked as (F., -C.). BOUSE. M. E. bousen, about A. D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii. 175. BOUT, BOUGHT. The Dan. bugt, sb., a bend, is not immediately derived from bugne, to bend ; but bugt, sb., and bugne, intrans. verb, are both alike derived from the base bug-, occurring in Icel. bug-ush, pt. t. pl. (reflexive) of the lost strong verb bj4ga*, cognate with A.S. beogan, to bend. The same base occurs again in A.S. bug-on, pt. t. pl. of beogan (as before). We also find bugt in Swedish, meaning 'bend, curve, bent, direction, gulf, bay;' and the Swed. weak verb buga, to bow, make a bow, bend down.

\*BOUT (2). (F., -O. H.G.) The etymology given of bout, a turn, at p. 72, is right as far as it goes, and explains bought in Spenser and Levins, and (probably) Milton's 'winding bout;' cf. 'bought of the arme, le ply du bras;' Palsgrave. But, as Wedgwood points out, it is highly probable that, 'in the expressions of a drinking-bout, a bout of fair or foul weather,' we have to do with a different word. Cotgrave gives : 'par boutees, by fits, or pushes, not all at once, eftsoons, now and then; ' which just answers to E. by bouts. As boutee is merely the fem. pp. of bouter, to thrust, to butt, it is clear that a bout is a butt, i.e. a thrust. Cf. Span. bote, a thrust, Ital. botta, 'a blowe, a stroake, a time,' Florio. 1 suppose E. bout to answer to O. F. bot, a thrust (mod. F. bout), and to have preserved a sense of the word which is lost in the mod. F. form, but preserved in boutee, as given in Cotgrave. The spelling with ou suggests that we received the word from O.F.; but it is shewn, under Butt (1), q. v., that O.F. boter is of Teutonic origin. Consequently, Wedgwood well remarks that ' the Du. bot or botte, a stroke or blow (ictus, impulsus-Kilian), as well as the nasalised bonte, is used in the dialect of West a bout of rain, wind, frost. Bij botten ; by bouts or intervals. Eene botte, or bonte goed, nat, droog, weder : a bout of good, wet, dry weather. De kinkhoest is bij bonten: the chincough comes in fits;' see De Bo, West Flem. Dict. So also Koolman, in his East Fries. Dict., gives the form bot, as in elk bot wen't rägend, every time that it rains. BOW (1). Add Swed. buga, to bow down, though this is only a weak verb; more important are the Icel. bogin and bugusk, occurring as the pp. and pt. t. pl. (reflexive) of a lost strong verb bjwga\* (cognate with the A.S. beogan), of which the pt. t. must have been bang, and the Teut. base BUG, answering to Aryan BHUGH, as already given. BOWLINE, l. 1. The definition 'a line to keep a sail in a bow' cannot be right, though it agrees with what is commonly given in Webster's Dictionary and elsewhere. The Icel. form of the word, bog-lina, distinctly links it with Icel. bogr, the bow of a ship; see Bow (4). It follows that it has no etymological connection with the verb bow, to bend, a fact which seems never to have been hitherto suspected by any writer of an English dictionary. As a fact, the bow line keeps a sail straight, and prevents it from being bowed. Webster defines it as 'a rope fastened near the middle of the leech or perpendicular edge of the square sails by subordinate parts called bridles, and used to keep the weather edge of the sail tight forward, when the ship is close-hauled. The true sense is 'side-line,' and it takes its name from being attached to the side or shoulder of the sail. See the Icel. Dict., s. v. bogr, which is explained as ' the shoulder, shoulder-piece, bow of a ship; also used of the side of a person or thing; a kinn boginn, on this side, a bada boga, on both sides.' It follows that the words which take the form bow require special care. On the one hand, we have bow (1), bow (2), bow (3), all from the  $\checkmark$  BHUGH; on the other, we have bow (4) and bow-line, allied to bough and to the Skt. bahus, an arm, from a different root.

*BOX (4). In the phr. to box the compass, the word is pro-bably Spanish. - Span. boxar, to sail round an island (Meadows). The Span. sb. box means a box tree, a piece of box-wood, and the act of doubling a cape. Diez points out that Span. bruxula or brujula, a sea-compass, has an intrusive r, and is derived from Lat. buxus, box-tree. It is therefore probable that there is a real connection between box (4) and box (1). BRACE. The O.F. brace once actually meant 'the two arms; see Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française. This explains E. brace in the sense of 'pair.' The braces of a ship are from the notion of holding firmly; cf. embrace.

BRACELET. An example of O. F. bracel, a defence for the arm, may be found in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française.

BRACKET. The word actually occurs as early as in Minsheu's Dict., ed. 1627, with the remarkable spelling bragget, and is explained to mean 'a corbell.' This completely alters the case, and suggests a totally different origin. It seems to be allied to O.F. braguette, 'a codpiece,' Cot., and to Span. bragueta, 'the opening of the forepart of a pair of breeches, in architecture, a kind of quarter or projecting mould,' Neuman. If so, it must be allied to E. breeches. Phillips, ed. 1706, explains brackets as small knees, or pieces of wood used to support galleries in ships, like Span. bragada de una curva, the throat of a knee of timber (as a nautical term), derived from Span. braga, breeches. Florio has Ital. brachetta, 'a cod-peece.

BRAD, l. 1. We actually find M. E. brad, used to gloss L. aculius (= aculeus) in Wright's Voc. i. 234, col. 2, l. 2. But this is a Northern form; the same Vocabulary has gat for 'goat,' and ra for 'roe,' p. 210. This is one more proof of its Scand. origin. BRAKE. Cf. also Swed. linbraka, i. e. a flax-brake, from lin, flax.

'Tredgold, in his treatise on Railroads, London, 1825, gives a full account of the use of the brake-wheel as applied to locomotives; N. and Q. 4 S. xi. 428. BRAT. See note on Cloth below.

BRAVADO. The fact seems to have been that the English turned -ada into -ado in certain words, such as barricado, ambuscado, &с.

BRAZE (2). To be marked as (E.). We actually find 'aero, ic brasige,' in Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 215, l. 17. BREED. The A.S. Dictionaries do not properly authorise this word. Yet it occurs (as Mr. Sweet points out) in Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 10, in a passage which also has the rare sb. brod. It is there said of bees, that 'of dam hunige hi bridad heora brod,' i.e. with the honey they nourish their brood. This fixes the word beyond dispute; so that A. S. brédan is derived from bród, a brood (by vowelchange from  $\delta$  to  $\delta$ ), precisely as fédan, to feed, is from fód, food. BREESE. Stratmann's Dictionary greatly helps us here; the M. E. form is brese, Wright's Voc. i. 255, col. 2 (where crestrum and Bosworth. Leo takes briosa to result from brimsa by loss of m, and the words are obviously very closely related. Hence the greater part of my article may stand. Cf. also Swed. broms, a horse-fly.

BREEZE, subst., cinders. The following note is by Mr. Nicol. 'Mr. Skeat, who explains breeze as a name given in London to ashes and cinders used instead of coal in brick-making, identifies the word with the Devonshire briss, "dust," "rubbish," which he and his predecessors derive, no doubt correctly, from F. bris, "breakage, formerly also "fragments." The meanings, however, of breeze and briss do not agree, for breeze, far from being dust or rubbish, is the valuable ashes and cinders separated from dust and rubbish heaps; and though F. bris du charbon de terre is "coaldust" or "small coal," bris alone has not this meaning. The forms differ still more, both the vowels and the final consonants of breeze and briss being irreconcilable. On the other hand, breeze agrees phonetically exactly with O. F. brese, originally "live coals," afterwards also "cinders," whose e corresponds regularly to the accented a of its Teutonic primitive brasa (which exists in the Swedish brasa, "fire," and in the verb brasa, found, with slightly varying meanings, in all the Scand. languages). The original vowel being kept when unaccented, appears in the F. verb braser, and in the derivative from which, as is well known, comes the Eng. brasier (brazier), "a pan to hold live coals." Having only recent examples of Engl. breeze, I do not know whether the spelling with ee is Early Mod., and consequently shows that in Mid. Engl. the word had éé (close), the invariable representative of the identical O. F. sound; if it is, it makes the formal identity of E. breeze and O. F. brese certain. The Mod. F. spelling braise with ai is, like clair, pair, aile for O. F. cler, here, ele, simply an orthographical recognition of the Late Old or Early Mod. F. change of  $\ell$  to  $\ell$  in these words; Palsgrave, in translating "cynders of coles" by breze, keeps the O. F. vowel-letter. Any difficulty as to the meaning is. I think, removed by the fact that (as may be seen in Bellows's excellent little pocket dictionary, 1877, under braise) F. braise is still the correct technical translation of Engl. breeze, cinders. — H. Nicol. Mr. Nicol subsequently sent me the following note. 'It turns out that in some O. F. dialects there really was a form braise with the diphthong ai, corresponding to a primitive brasia (Ital. bragia).' Thus breeze is from O. F. brese, braise, allied to F. braser, for which see Braze (1). Cf. Vialloon braizettes, small coal (Sigart).

BRIAR. We already find 'arguens (or anguens), breer' in the very old Epinal gloss; see Appendix B. to Report on Rymer's Foedera, p. 154, l. 7. This shews that the A.S. spelling was breer as early as the eighth century. If the Irish preas is related, it must have been borrowed from a Teut, form.

BRISK. Dele Section B. If brisk is Celtic, it cannot be cognate with fresh and frisky.

BROIL (1), to fry, roast over hot coals. (F., – Teut.) Dele section  $\beta$  of this article. The M. E. broylen, or broilen clearly answers, as Stratmann points out, to O. F. bruiller, to broil, grill, roast, given in Roquefort with a quotation from the Image du Monde. And this O. F. verb can hardly be other than an extension of O. F. bruir (mod. F. brouir) used in the same sense, for which see Littré and Roquefort; the mod. F. brouir merely means 'to blight.' This O. F. bruir is of Teut. origin; from the verb repre-sented by M. H. G. brüejen, brüeigen, brüen, to singe, burn, G. brühen, to scald, Du. broeijen, to brew, hatch, grow very hot; which are clearly allied to E. brew. See Brew. ¶ That the F. word is difficult, appears from the dictionaries. Brachet gives it up; Roquefort tries to get brouir out of Lat. urere (1); Hamilton connects it with L. pruina. But see Littré, Scheler, and Burguy. Note that this O. F. bruiller is distinct from F. brûler, O. F. brusler.

BROIL (2), a disturbance, tumult. (F.) Dele section  $\beta$  of this article. As to the etymology of F. brouiller, to disorder, I am at a loss. We must connect it with Ital. broglio, 'a hurlie burlie, a confusion, a huddle, a coyl,' Florio; and with brogliare, 'to pill, spoile, marre, waste, confound, mangle, toss, disorder,' id. Diez connects broglio with Low L. brogilus, also broilus, brolium, a park, or enclosure where animals were kept for the chase, which agrees with O. Ital. broilo or brollo, explained by Florio as a kitchen-garden, mod. Ital. bruolo, a garden. Cf. also Port. brulha, the knob out of which a bud rises, abrolhar, to bud, blossom, G. bruhl, a marshy place overgrown with bushes. The notion seems to be that, from a substantive meaning a park or grove, also a thicket or overgrowth of bushes, was formed a verb signifying to d or entangled. The reader must consult Diez, Scheler, Scheler refers it to G. brudeln, brodeln, to bubble, cf. F. brouillard, mist. In Mahn's Webster a heap must surely be a misprint for oestrum). The A.S. forms briosa,  $\stackrel{a}{\rightarrow}$  of supposed cognates are given, many of which I cannot find, and breosa, are both authorised, occurring in glosses; see Leo's Glossar, others do not seem to agree with the interpretation given. I cannot think that the word is, as yet, fully solved.

BROKER. Perhaps (F., -O. Low G.) rather than (E.). The M.E. form is almost invariably brokour or brocour (as pointed out by Dr. Chance in N. and Q.); see P. I'lowman, B. ii. 65, iii. 46, v. 1 30. 248; C. iii. 60, 66, vii. 95. This answers to Anglo-F. brocow. Liber Albes, 400; and the suffix -our is certainly F. (= Lat. -atorem). The Anglo F. word is more commonly abrocour or abrokour, Lib. Alb. 261, 268, 282, 315, 586, 722; and we even find abroker, vb. to act as broker, 668. The corresponding Low Lat. form is abrocator, id. 249, 347. 401, 402, 636. I understand Dr. Chance to suggest that this is derived from F. broc, 'a steane, great flagon, tankard, or pot.' Cotgrave; in which case the orig sense may have been a seller of liquids by retail; cf. mod F. broc, a jug, jugfal. The F. broc, Ital. brocca, is supposed to have been a pitcher of a pointed form; see Brooch.  $\beta$ . But I suspect the word to be of Teut. origin, and to have come from the Netherlands. Cf. E. Fries. broker, a broker, schipsbroker, a ship-broker (Koolman); also brukere, a broker, in Schiller and Lübben's Mid. Low G. Dict. Koolman thinks, as I do, that the word is allied to O. Du. broke, bruyck, breuck, custom, use (Kilian), and to the A.S. brúcan, to use, E. brook. The spelling with o or u renders this opinion most likely; see also Mätzner. I suppose that the word was not formed from the verb directly, but from the sb. signifying 'use,' &c. As this sb. took the form brucke in M. E. it would follow that broker was not an orig. E. word, but borrowed (as above said) through F. from the Netherlands; as is further suggested by the occurrence of E. Fries. broker, Mid. Low G. brukere. as cited above. Hence also we may explain the sense of the word; a broker is not, literally, a 'user,' but 'one who determines the usages' of trade. This is well illustrated by the Danish, in which language (by the usual change of k to g), the sb. is spelt brug, with the senses of 'use, employment, practice, custom, usage, trade, business ;' whence brugsmand (lit. broke-man), a tradesman, one who conducts a trade or business (den som driver et vist Slags Brug eller Næring). Danish even has the form jord-bruger, a farmer, which is, literally, an 'earth-broker,' one whose business it is to till the earth. Cf. also Swed. bruk, custom, use, fashion, practice, work, business, employ ment. But they who prefer to derive the word from F. bro: may do so; there is little to be said against it.

BROOD. See note on Breed (above), p. 787.

BROUD. See note on Breed (above), p. 767. BROW. Also A. S. brew. We find acc. pl. brewas, dat. pl. brewam, in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 38. Also A. S. breway; 'Palpebre, brewas,' Wright's Voc. 1. 42, col. 2. The pl. brewas also occurs in Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, c. 28, ed. Sweet, p. 192. BRUISE, l. 7. The A. S. brysan is thoroughly authorised; not only does it occur in Be Domes Dæge, ed. Lumby, 1. 49, but in Matt. xxi. 44, we have both to-brysed, i.e. utterly crushed. and tobrýst, 3 p. s. pr. t. of the compound verb to brýsan. But this A. S. brýsan would have given M. E. brisen, mod. E. brise or brize, whereas we even find the spelling broysyd, bruised; Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, p. 73, last line. We must therefore prefer the F. etymology. β. The A.S. brysan may be compared with Du. bros, broos, fragile: note also G. bros-ame, a crumb (broken bread), which Fick (iii. 219) connects with M.H.G. briuzan, A.S. breótan, to break in pieces. The base of A.S. bredtan is the Teut. BRUT, to break in pieces, Fick. iii, 218; which suggests for the A.S. brysan a parallel base BRUS. Y. The O. F. bruiser, brisier, is probably from the same Teut. base. BUDGE (2). The Anglo-French form boge (fur), in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363, precisely answers in form to O. F. boge, variant of bouge, a wallet (Burguy). Palsgrave spells the word

BUFFALO. Perhaps the Gk. βούβαλos is a foreign word in Gk., its Gk. form being merely influenced by Boûs. Boußakis was orig. an antelope, not a wild ox, and is said to be N. African (Herod. 4. 192). See N. and Q. 2 S. ix. 1 (G. C. Lewis). * BUGLOSS, a plant. (F., -L., -Gk.) Lit. 'ox-tongue.' Spelt buglosse, Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. - F. buglosse, 'buglosse;' Cot. - Lat. buglossa; also buglossos (Lewis and Short). -Gk. Bouryhwoos; so called from the shape of the leaves. - Gk. Boustem of βoûs, an ox; and γλώσσα, tongue. See Cow (1) and Gloss (2).

BUILD. I now find that the A.S. byldan, to build, is authorised; but I do not think it is at all an early word. It makes little ultimate difference, but enables us to trace the word quite clearly. Thus mod. E. build = A. S. byldan, to build, formed (by vowel-change of o to y) from A. S. bold, a dwelling. This A. S. bold has been shewn to be of Scand. origin. The verb and sb. occur together in the very first line of the short poem entitled 'The Grave,' pr, in Thorpe's Analecta Anglo-Saxonica, p. 153. 'De wæs bold gebyld' - for thee was a dwelling built. Just below, the pp. is spelt ibyld, which is quite a late spelling. We also find M. E. byllen, to build, directly of BURNISH. Wedgwood says: 'The union of these significations from O. Swed. bylja; the pt. t. bylled is in Mandeville, Trav. p. 98. BULB. Prof. Postgate takes L. bulbus to be merely borrowed from Gk.  $\beta o \lambda \beta o's$ , and says that we may then assign to 'bulb' or 'onion' the sense of 'edible root,' from  $\checkmark$  GAR, to devour, eat, whence Gk. Bopós, gluttonous, Bopá, meat; cf. yop-ámies, explained βάφανοι, by Hesychius, from the same of GAR. See Voracious. But Wharton, in his Etyma Græca, connects Bolads with Lat. globus. See Globe.

BULIGE. The M.E. pp. bolgit, bulging out, occurs as an epithet of ships, A. D. 1400; see Reliq. Antiq. ii. 24. BULLACE, 1.4. For 'Irish bulos, a prune,' read 'Irish bulistair, a bullace, a sloe; the form bulos, quoted by O'Reilly, is taken from Shaw's Gaelic Dictionary, and is Gaelic, not Irish.' BULLION, sect. B. I am asked to explain this. I find mod.

F. billon explained in Hamilton as copper coin, base coin, also, the place where base coin is carried to be melted and coined again. This last sense precisely agrees with that of O. F. bullione, the mint. It is remarkable that, as shewn in Trench, Select Glossary, the E. bullion was once used as an equivalent for F. billon in the sense of debased coin. There is thus abundant confusion between E. bullion and F. billon, obviously due to the similarity in sound, and to the preservation of the O.F. word in E., while it was lost in French. We may also note that one sense of bullion in Blount's Nomolexicon is 'sometimes the King's Exchange or place, whether [whither] gold in the lump is brought to be tryed or exchanged; 27 Edw. 3. Stat. 2. cap. 14; 4 Hen. 4. cap. 10. Spelt bolion, Arnold's Chron., ed. 1811. p. 229 : bollyon, Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 305 (1586).

* BULRUSH; see under Rush (2), p. 520. BULWARK. Spelt bullwarck; Life of Lord Grey of Wilton (C. S.), p. 24; date, before 1562. Spelt bulwarke in Holinshed (see the same page). It also occurs in Skelton, Erle of Northumber-lande, 1, 48; ed. Dyce, i. 8; and the pl. buluerkis is in Arnold's Chronicle, ed. 1811, p. 287. And we even find M. E. bulwerkes, A.D.

1400, in Reliq. Antiq. ii. 22. BUMPKIN. This is right. We find Du. boom, '(1) a tree, (2) a barre,' Hexham; also O. Du. boomken, 'a little tree,' id.; proving that boomken was in use as the dimin. of boom.

BUN. The word occurs rather early; see bonnes, pl. buns, in Myrour of Our Lady, p. xxxiii. l. 3. Bunne, a kind of white bread; Liber Albus (Rolls ed.), iii. 423, 468, Edw. iii. anno xlvto, i. e

BUNGALOW. The Bengáli word is bánglá, a thatched cottage, from Banga, i. e. Bengal; Wilson, Indian Terms, p. 59.

BUNGLE. The explanation 'to bang frequently' is correct. But the vowel u is due to the pp. of a lost strong verb bing-an *, pt. t. bang *, pp. bung-en *. Hence also O. Du. bing-el, 'a cudgill' (lit. a bang-er), Hexham; prov. E. bang-le, a large rough stick (Hal-liwell); O. Du. bung-e, 'a drumme' (what is banged), Hexham. See further illustrations in Koolman's E. Fries. Dict. s. v. bingeln, büngeln.

BUNTING (2). Wedgwood strengthens his identification of bunting (the material of which flags are made) with bunt, to sift flour, by citing the F. etamine, which unites the idea of sifting flour with the above material. He cites from Tarver's Fr.-E. and E.-Fr. Dict. the following: 'Etamine, sort of woollen or silk stuff, bolting-cloth. Passer par l'étamine, to bolt, to sift. Bunting, étamine.' This This is important, and may be accepted as settling the matter. We may derive bunting from the verb bunt, M. E. bonten, to sift, in the Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 93; see the Glossary. Mätzner suppores the M. E. bonten to be a mere variant of M. E. bulten, to sift, mod. E. bolt, to sift; for which see pp. 69, 786. The sb. bulling-cloth occurs before A.D. 1400; see Wright's Voc. i. 155, l. 16.

BURDEN (2). See bourdon in Littré. Perhaps we ought to separate bourdon, a droning sound, from bourdon in the sense of pilgrim's staff. If so, the view taken by Diez requires some correction.

BURLY. Not (E.), but (C.?, with E. suffix.). *BURNET, a plant. (F., -M. H. G.) A name given chiefly to the Poterium Sanguisorba and Sanguisorba officinalis; see E. D. S. Plant-Names, and Prior. Prior says the name was given to the Poterium because of its brown flowers. The flowers of the Sanguisorba are of a deep purple-brown colour. The word occurs in MS. Sloane, 2457, fol. 6 (see Halliwell) as synonymous with pimpernel, but Mr. Britten remarks that the poterium is meant. The word occurs in Low Lat. as burneta, Reliq. Antiq. i. 37, so that it is doubtless French. - O. F. bruneta, given by Godefroi as the name of a flower, now unknown; but it is clearly our burnet. Also spelt brunette, and the same word with O. F. brunette, also burnette, a kind of dark brown cloth, also a brunette. See further under Brunette. The etymology in Mahn, that it is from its burning taste, is childish; for the suffix -et (which is F.) is not explained thereby.

[brown and polish] merits further illustration. The adj. brwn, brown, was formerly used in the sense of polished, shining, as "luisanz cez espiez bruns," these bright swords shining, Chanson de Roland, 1043. [So also "s'espee d'acier brun," his sword of bright steel, id. 2089.] The E. brown must have had the same meaning when the brown bills of our yeomanry were spoken of as the national weapon;' with more to the same purpose. Numerous examples may be found in O.F. and M. H.G. poetry. Brown seems to have combined the senses of 'burning,' i. e. bright, and 'burnt,' i. e. embrowned. BUSINESS. See note on Busy (below).

BUSKIN. (Du., -F., -L., -Gk.)Sewel (1754) gives Du. brooskens, 'buskins.' This is a corruption (by the shifting of r, as in E. bird for brid, &c.) of O. Du. berseken, a little purse (Hexham); dimin. of borse, a purse (id.). This is verified by the fact that the F. brodequin, a buskin, appearing in Palsgrave and as early as in Froissart, was a corruption of the same O. Du. word, and stands for brosequin. The Du. formation is evidenced by the peculiar form of the suffix, which answers to E. -kin and G. -chen, whilst the transposition of r is manifest in the Ital. borzacchini, 'buskins, fine bootes,' Florio; which seems also to be of Low G. origin as regards its suffix. As to the sense, note that Florio also gives borzachinetti, 'little buskins, little cheuerell [kid] purses,' evidently from borsa, 'a purse, a little bag.' Cotgrave also gives F. bourson, 'a little purse, case, bag;' from bourse, a purse.  $\beta$ . If this be right, it is further evident that the O. Du. borse was, in its turn, borrowed from U. F. borse, a purse; see further under Purse. γ. The E. buskin may have been borrowed from the Du. form borseken rather than broseken, which would more easily account for the loss of the r. This is further corroborated by the O. Span. borzegui or boszegui, a buskin (Minsheu, 1623), mod. Span. borzegui. This Span. word has lost a final n, which reappears in borceguin-ero, a buskin-maker, and is represented by m in Port. borzegium, a buskin. See Palmer (Folk-Etymology), Scheler (s. v. brodequin), Diez (s. v. borzacchino). I do not observe that either Scheler or Littré mentions the important fact, that F. brodequin was once spelt with s (for d). Thus Du Guez (ab. 1532) has: 'the buskyns, les brousequins;' see Palsgrave, ed. Génin, p. 907, col. 3. See also broissequin in Godefroy; and we may note that the form brosquin is still known ; see Delboulle.

BUSY. The question as to the antiquity of the word business may now be set at rest. Though not given in any A.S. Dict., we nevertheless find bisignisse occurring as a gloss to Lat. sollicitudinem in sect xx. of the Table of Contents to St. Matthew's Gospel in the Lindisfarne MS. Hence business is a purely E. word, formed quite independently of O. F. busoignes, though the latter may have modified its use. We find O.F. bosoignes, wants, need, business, in the Glossary to the Liber Custumarum.

BUTT (2). Rather (F., - Low L., - Gk.), See remarks on Boot 1) above.

BUTTRESS. (F., - M. H. G.) Palsgrave has the forms bottras and butteras. The derivation from F. bouter, to thrust, is now known to be the correct one. Wedgwood rightly says :--- 'If Godefroy's [O. F.] Dict. had been published a little earlier, Skeat would probably not have offered this very unsatisfactory etymology [which identifies the word with brattice]. We there find bouteret, buteret (of an arch or pillar), thrusting, bearing a thrust. Et y a vi. ars bouterez en maniere de pillers qui boutent contre le siege du hannap; Inv. du Duc d'Anjou, 1360. Les ars bouterez (i.e. arcs-boutants, flying buttresses) sont mis trop haut; Reg. des délib. du Chap. de Troyes, 1362. Deux pilliers bouterez, 1358. Soubbassement avec plus-seurs bouteretz, with many buttresses; 1504.' It thus appears that buttress = bouterets, and is really a plural! The F. pl. suffix -ez or -ets was mistaken, in English, for the commoner F. suffix -esse, Eng. -ess. Buttress is, in fact, a mistake for buttrets, and the word should have been, in the singular, buttret. The confusion was due to the ambiguous value of the F. z, which properly stood for ts, but was often considered as being merely a voiced s. We find the further corruption butterace, pl. butteraces, in the Will of Hen. VI. ; Nichols, Royal Wills, pp. 295, 302; but at p. 303. in the same Will, buttrace is a pl. form. So also Palsgrave uses butteras as a pl. sb., where he says: 'I butteras a buyldyng, I underset it with butteras to make it strongar.' *BUTTY, a companion or partner in any work. (Scand. ; or F., Scand.) This is a prov. E. word, used in several dialects (Halliwell). A butty-gang is 'a gang of men to whom a portion of the work in the construction of railways, &c., is let, the proceeds of the work being equally divided amongst them, something extra being allowed to the head man;' Ogilvie's Dict. I make a note here that the etymology is clearly pointed out in Palsgrave, who gives : ' Bot' felowe. parsonner,' for which read parsonnier, i.e. partner. Just the cloth (see Nares, and Index to the Unton Inventories) was so named below he has: 'Boty, that man [read men] of warre take, butin.' from Dornick, i.e. Tournay, Lat. Tornacus. Hence boly-felowe is booly-fellow, a partner or sharer in booty taken, and bully-gang is a gang of men who share equally. The shortening of the vowel oo to u is familiar to us in the words blood, flood; the use of butty for butty-fellow easily followed, when the etymology was lost sight of.

CABAL. Not (F., - Heb.), but rather (F., -L., - Heb.). The Low Lat. is cabbala (Ducange). The Heb. gabbalah is Rabbinical

Heb., not Biblical.—A. L. M. CABRIOLET. Cabriolets were, in honour of his Majesty's birth-day, introduced to the public this morning;' Gent. Mag. 1823, pt. i. p. 463, under the date April 23. (But Geo. IV. was born on Aug. 12!)

*CACIQUE, CAZIQUE, a W. Indian prince or chief. (Span., -W. Indian.) A name given to a chief of some W. Indian tribes. In Minsheu, ed. 1627. – Span. cacique, 'an Indian prince;' Minsheu, Span. Dict. (1623). From the old language of Hayti (Webster).

CAD. That this is short for cadie, has been disputed. But see the article on cadie in the larger edition of Jamieson's Dictionary. We there find ' the cadies are a fraternity who run errands,' &c. ' I had then no knowledge of the caways, a very useful black-guard, who . . go of errands; and though they are wretches, that in rags lye upon the streets at night, yet are they often considerably trusted, &c. Cf. Northants. caddee, a servant's servant, under-waggoner (Baker). The ead of an omnibus is the conductor (not necessarily a term of reproach); see Sketches by Boz (1850), ch. xvii.

CADET. M. Paul Meyer informs me that capdet is probably a Gascon form, and that it does not represent Low Lat. capitellum, but Low Lat. capitellum, by a habit of Gascon which puts final t for final II.

*CADI, a judge. (Arab.) 'The graunde Cady;' E. Webbe, Travels (1590), ed. Arber, p. 33. - Arab. qází, a cadi or cazi, a judge, civil, criminal, and ecclesiastic; Rich. Dict. p. 1109; Palmer, p. 464. The third letter is ض, which Devic transliterates by d (with a dot be-neath it). B. Hence was formed (by prefixing the Arab. article al, and inserting 1) the Span. alcalde, a judge, which appears oc-casionally in E. literature ; it is spelt alcade in An Eng. Garner, vi. 14 (ab. 1586). The inserted l, says Devic, arose from an emphatic pronunciation of the Arabic .....

CALLOW. The lost initial s appears in Swed. shallig, bald, allied to shala, to peel, from the  $\checkmark$  SKAR, to shear, as already stated. See further under Scall.

CALM. Cf. Port. calma, heat. It deserves to be added that the Low Lat. country, heat, must have been familiarised to many by its occurrence in the Vulgate version of Job xxx. 30.

*CALTHROP, CALTRAP, a star-thistle, a ball with spikes for annoying cavalry. (L. and Teut.?) Callbrop is gen. used to denote a ball stuck with four spikes, so arranged that one of them points upwards while the other three rest on the ground. 'Cal-trappe, chaussetrappe;' Palsgrave. 'Tribulus marinus, calketrappe, sea-pistel;' Reliq. Antiq. i. 37. M. E. kalketrappe, P. Plowman, C. xxi. 296. A. S. calcetreppe, star-thistle, A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 316. The most likely solution of this difficult word is to derive it from Lat. calci-, crude form of calz, the heel, and a Latinised form of the Teutonic word trap. Scheler explains F. chaussetrappe from a barbarous Lat. calcitrapa, that which entraps the heel, which will equally well explain the A.S. calcetreppe. Florio gives O. Ital. calcatrippa, star-thistle, where calca- is plainly supposed to be allied to calcare, to tread, the form of the Ital. word being slightly altered in order to suggest this sense. See further under Calk and Trap. The usual Ital. word for calthrop, viz. tribolo, is a totally different word, and plainly derived from tribulus, a calthrop, also a kind of thistle. We cannot possibly derive the F. -trappe in chaussetrappe from L. tribulus, which is what Mahn seems to suggest. See my note to P. Plowman, C. xxi. 296; also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 52, note 3. *CALUMENT, a kind of pipe for tobacco. (F.-L.) 'Smoked the columnet, the Peace-pipe;' Longfellow, Song of Hiawatha, c. I.-F. calumet, the stem of a herb, a pipe (Littre); a dimin. form, allied to F. chalumeau, "the stem of an herbe, also a wheaten or oaten straw, or a pipe made thereof;' Cot. These words, like E. shawm, CALVE. The A.S. coalfan really occurs. Mr. Sweet refers me to Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 300, last line, q. v. It is properly formed, from A.S. cenif, a calf. CAMBRIC. The E. form is not a corruption of the F. name Cambray, but of the Flemish name of the town, viz. Kamerik. The was Camaracum. Sewel gives 'Kameriks-doek, chambric where doek means cloth. Similarly, dornick, a kind of CAMLET. Of Arabic origin; not from camel, but from Arab. khamlat, from khaml, pile, plush; Marco Polo, ed. Yule, i. 348. We find Arab. khamlat, khamalat, ' camelot, silk and camel's hair, also, all silk or velvet,' Rich. Dict. p. 628; khaml, 'the skirts or flaps of a garment, a carpet with a long pile, a cushion on a saddle, plumage of an ostrich ;' ibid. Thus it appears that camel's hair was som times used for making it, so that confusion with camel was inevitable. CAMPHOB. Spelt camfere in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 135 (about 1502).

CANDY. But the Arab. word may be of Aryan origin. Cf. Skt. Mand, to cut or break in pieces, to bite, Manda, a piece; whence khindava, sweet-meats, CANNEL-COAL. The word is old. 'The choicest coal in England called cannell;' R. Blome's Britannia, 1673, cited in N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 485. At the same reference the word is wrongly derived from kindle, whereas kindle is itself a derivative of canadi. of which cannel is merely the prov. E. pronunciation, as already explained. In N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 18, we have a quotation for 'Canel, like Se-cole,' from Leland's Itinerary, vol. vii. fol. 59; 'The Canel, or Candle, coal; ' North, Life of Lord Guildford, i. 278, 2nd ed. 1808 (Davies); Defoe, Tour through Gt. Britain, iii. 248, 4th ed.

1748 (id.). *CANON (2), a dignitary of the church. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. canun, Layamon, ii. 598, l. 24289; canoun, id. (later text), l. 24288. -O. F. canone, canogue (Roquefort), more commonly canonie, che noine (Littre, s. v. chanoine); the pl. canunie occurs in the Chanson da Roland, 3637. - Lat. cononicum, acc. of canonicus, adj., one on the church-roll or list, and so in receipt of church-funds. - Lat. canon, the church-roll or list. See Hatch, Bampton Lectures, p. 202. See Canon. N. B. The Span. coños, a deep ravine, lit. a tube, is the same word as canon, a cannon; see Cannon.

CANT (1). The word occurs in the simple sense of 'sing' in the phr. 'cant and chirp;' Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xiv. 356. 'To cante, to speake' is given as a cant word (with its explanation) in Harman's Caveat, p. 84. I have pointed out that many cant words came from the Netherlands; so, in this case, we may derive cost from Walloon canter, to sing (Sigart), rather than from Lat. cantare directly CANT (2). The G. kante was merely borrowed from the Low G., and is not an independent word; this accounts for there being no change in the spelling (from t to z); see Weigand. See further under Canton (below).

*CANTLE, a piece. (F., - Teut.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, iii. 1. 100. M. E. cantel, Chaucer, C. T. 3010. - O. F. cantel (mod. F. chanteau), a piece, corner, bit; see Littré, s. v. chanteau. The same as Low L. cantellus, a piece; formed with dimin. suffix -ellus from G. kante, a corner; cf. Du. kant, a border, edge, corner. See Cant (2). And see Canton.

CANTON. The problem of the relationship (if any) of Du. hant, an edge, to Lat. canthus, the tire round a wheel, is not easy. I have said, at p. 92, that they cannot be connected; but this was founded on the supposition that Du. kant was a truly Teutonic word. I would now adopt the solution given by Weigand, in his G. Etym. Dict. s. v. Kante, that the G. kante was merely borrowed from Dutch or Low German (see note on Cant (2) above); whilst the Du. word, in its turn, was likewise unoriginal, being borrowed from O. F. cani, edge, still preserved in the mod. F. phrase mettre de champ, poser de champ, to lay (bricks) edgewise; see champ (2) in Littré. These relationships once established, the word is seen to be of Romance origin; from Lat, canthus, the tire of a wheel, borrowed from Gk. sardos, the corner of the eye, the felloe of a wheel. Quintilian, i. 5. 88, considers it as barbarian, meaning African or Spanish, but there is nothing to shew for its being not Gk. B. If this be the right account, the original is Gk. sardos, whence were borrowed Lat. canthus, and (probably) W. cant, rim. From Lat. canthus were derived O.F. cant, F. cant-on, Ital. cant-o, Stc. We may mark cant (2) as (Du., -F., -Gk.); cant-sen as (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.); cant-o as (Ital.,  $-L_{.,} - Gk.$ ); cant-on as (F.,  $-Low L_{.,} - L_{.,} - Gk.$ ); and de-cant as (F., - Ital.,  $-L_{.,} - Gk.$ ). Another derivative is s-cant-ling, q. v., to be marked as  $(F_{\cdot,-} L_{\cdot,-} Gk_{\cdot})$ . CAPE (2). To be marked as  $(F_{\cdot,-} Ital_{\cdot,-} L_{\cdot})$ .

. . an ague fit (Dante)' in Meadows' Ital. Dict. I suspect this was an old interpretation of the word in the passages to which I refer, but the right sense is 'shade.' I have also, unintentionally, somewhat mistaken Wedgwood's meaning, being thus led off the track. His suggestion is, to derive capriceio from capo, head, and riccio, curled, crisped, frizzled; the reference being to the bristling of the hair. The carni-vora, a devouring of flesh, applied to Shrove-Tuesday and to words raccapriccio, horror, raccapricciare, to terrify, already cited, are much to the point; the prefix rac- (it may be noted) stands for reac- = re-ad, as in rac-cendere, to rekindle. Capriccio would thus mean a bristling of the hair, a yearning emotion, a longing; Wedgwood cites from Altieri 'aver capriccio d'una cosa, to long for a thing, to have a fancy for it. Esser capricciosamente innamorato d'una persona, to be passionately in love with one.' Cf. s'accapriccia, shudders, Dante, Inf. 22. 31; arriciar, to stand on end (as hair), id. β. Capo is from Lat. caput, head; riccio, bristling, is 23. 19. connected with riccio, a hedge-hog, from Lat. ericius, a hedgehog, lit. 'bristling animal;' see Urchin. CAPSIZE. The Span. capuzar, mentioned at the end of the article, comes nearest to the E. form.

CAPSTAN. M. E. capstan, in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 418. Post in a shyppe called cabastayne, cabestain ;' Palsgrave. Minsheu's Span. Dict. ed. 1627 gives only the form ' Cabrestante, a capston (sic) in a ship.' And he even gives 'estante, standing.' This being so, Wedgwood's etymology greatly gains in probability. He explains it as 'a standing crab [meaning windlass], a windlass set upright for the purpose of enabling a large number of men to work at it,' in opposition to the ordinary modification of the machine, where it is more convenient to make the axis horizontal. A crab is a kind of crane (see Webster), here used to translate Span. cabre (Wedgwood). I do not find cabre, but cabria means an axle-tree or crane, and cabra is a goat, or a machine for throwing stones. The F. cheure means both a goat and a crab or crane; and it is well ascertained that cabria, cabra (like F. chevre) are derived from Lat. capra, a she-goat; see note on Pulley, sect. y, p. 476. b. The etymology from capistrum is given by Mahn, but I think it must be abandoned in favour of that from capra, she-goat, and stantem, acc. of pres. pt. of stare, to stand. Let Monlau, the author of the Spanish Etymological He Dictionary (2nd ed. Madrid, 1881), be heard on this point. says of cabrestante, that its origin is from Lat. capra stans, standing goat; cabra has originated the name, not of this machine only, but of those called cabreia, cabria, cabrio, &cc. So also Scheler and Littré.

CARAVAN. For an early use of the word, see Hackluyt's

Voyages, 1598, ii. 203, where it is spelt Carowan. *CARBOY, a large globular bottle of glass, protected by basket-work. (Arab.?) Modern; in Webster, Worcester, and Brande.-Pers. qarába, a large flagon, Palmer's Dict. col. 468; which is per-haps of Arab. origin. Cf. Pers. and Arab. qirbaA, a water-skin, waterhaps of Arab. origin. Cf. Pers. and Arab. girban, a water-skin, water-bottle, Rich. Dict. p. 1123; Palmer's Dict. col. 469. * CABK, solicitude, anxiety. (F., -L., -C.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 44. M. E. cark (spelt carke), Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 12; Cursor Mundi, l. 20790 (Northern dialect; another MS. has charge); Gamelyn, l. 760. [Somner gives A. S. care, care, but it is wholly unauthorised; the word being really French.] The true solution of this mord nearer before clearly worthed out is to be found solution of this word, never before clearly pointed out, is to be found in the Anglo-French word kark, a burden, weight, cargo, which is nothing but the Norman form of F. charge, as is also evident from the Cursor Mundi, ll. 20790, 23994, 24233. This form kark occurs in the Liber Albus, ed. H. T. Riley, p. 224; and is corroborated by the occurrence of the verb sorkarker for sorcharger in the Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 26, A.D. 1275; so also descarkere, to unload, Lib. Albus (Gloss.). Hence cark meant, originally, a weight, load; but came to be used particularly of 'a load of care.' The W. care, anxiety, solicitude, is probably the E. word borrowed; cf. Bret. karg, a load, burden (probably French); though the ultimate root is Celtic. The Low Lat. carcare, to load, occurs in the Liber Albus (iii. 380). Cark is thus a doublet of charge; see Charge. Cotgrave gives F. charge, sb., 'a load, burthen, fardle, also a charge, hinderance, or cause of extraordinary expence; '&c. I may add that we even find kark or karke, a load, in English; for in Arnold's Chron., 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 99, we find mention of 'a karke of peper' and a 'kark of gynger.' Der. cark, veb, spelt carke in Palsgrave, whence the phr. 'cark-ing care'; in the Cursor Mundi, we find 'carkid (also charkid) wit care, 'll. 23994, 24870; see also l. 24233, where another reading is charge. CARNATION. To be marked as (F., - Ital., - L.). Littré gives carnation, but without any earlier authority than Fénelon. It was merely borrowed from Ital. carnagione.

CARNIVAL. Littré explains Low Lat. carne levamen as 'a taking away of the flesh,' but I can find no warrant for any such extraordinary interpretation of levamen. It is true that Ducange gives carnisprivium, a deprivation of flesh, as one of the names for the days on which the faithful began their abstinence, such days beginning on the Sunday before Ash-Wednesday. But the same days were regarded by the many in quite a different light, and hence we find such Low-Latin terms as carnis-capium, a taking of flesh, and the carnival. I therefore incline to the opinion that carnelevamen, carniscapium, and carnivora (names for Shrove-Tuesday) all refer to feasting, and that levamen has its usual sense of 'solace.' The F. Mardi gras, lit. 'fat Tuesday,' is unambiguous. *CAROCHE, a kind of coach. (F.,-Ital.,-C.) Obsolete; but the present sense of carriage seems to have been brought about by confusion with it. 'The great carock,' Ben Jonson, Devil is an the 'ordinary use of caroches' began about A.D. 1605; Dekker, in his Seven Deadly Sinnes, 1606, ed. Arber, p. 20, mentions 'the Grand Signiors Carcach.'-F. caroche, given in Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave as a variant of carosse or carozze, 'a carosse or caroach ;' Cot. Carceke is a Walloon form (Sigart). - Ital. carroccia, carrozza, 'a caroce, a coche, a chariot; 'Florio. Extended from Ital. carro,

'a cart, chariot, Florio; which is of Celtic origin. See Car. CAROUSE. It will be noticed that the G. garans is an adverb. We find the same adverbial use in English. I pledge them all carouse-a;' Like Will to Like, in Hazlitt's Old Plays, iii. 339. Cf. 'And quaff carouses to thee of my blood,' id. xiv. 101. 'Carouse that bowl to me;' id. xiv. 135. W. Kemp, in 1600, was 'offered carouses' by his entertainers; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, vii. 20.

CARRIAGE. I give the etymology under carry. I have been taken to task for not mentioning that the use of the modern E. carriage has been affected by confusion with F. carrosse, a carriage, frequently spelt caroche in old authors. It seemed to me hardly worth while to mention a fact so obvious, as I had given the reference to Trench's Select Glossary. See Caroche above.

CASSIA. Not  $(L_{n} - Heb.)$ , but  $(L_{n} - Gk_{n} - Heb.)$ . CAST. The orig. word for 'heap' is still better preserved in the very common Swed. dial. kas, a heap, cognate with Icel. kös, a pile, heap. See Rietz.

*CASTANETS, instruments composed of two small, concave shells of ivory or hard wood, loosely fastened together by a ribbon passing over the thumb, and made to snap together by beating one of them with the middle finger. (F., - Span, -L., -Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. castagnettes, pl., 'finger-knackers, wherewith players make a pretty noise in some kind of daunces;' Cot.-Span. castañetas, castanets; pl. of castañeta, orig. the noise made with the fingers in dancing the fandango and bolero, so called because resembling the crackling of chestnuts when roasted; cf. Span. castanetazo, the sound or crack of a chestnut which bursts in the fire. -Span. castaña, a chestnut. - Lat. castanea, the chestnut-tree. - Gk. ragraror, a chestnut; see Chestnut.

CATAMARAN. See Davies, Supplementary Glossary, where extracts are given. It seems to have sometimes meant a fire-ship, and hence a cantankerous old woman. For '(Hindustani),' read (Hindustani-Tamil).' I have already said the word is of Tamil origin, and means 'tied logs.' I am informed that the Malayalam form of the word is kettamaram, where the derivation is easily traced; viz. from Malayalam ketta, a tie or bond, and Malayalam and Tamil maram, timber. These words are given in H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, pp. 273, 331. CATARACT, last line. It is much better to separate hypropu from Lat. frango, and to refer the former to VWARK (no. 355,

CATCH. Some have said that catch must be Teutonic, because the pt. t. causte occurs in Layamon. Not so; for the pt. t. causte was merely formed by analogy with laugte from M. E. lacchen, used with nearly the same sense as cacchen. That the word was borrowed from Picard cacher (Littré, s. v. chasser) is clear from the fact that we also find O. Du. kaesse, a chase at tennis, kaess-spel. tennis, kaets-bal = E. catch-ball; see Hexham. These are not true Dutch words, but borrowed from Picard.

*CATENARY, belonging to a chain. (L.) Chiefly in the math. phr. a catenary curve. which is the curve in which a chain hangs when supported only at the ends. Formed from L. caten-a, a chain, with suffix arius.

*CATERAN, a Highland soldier or robber. (Gaelic.) In Waverley, c. xv, Sir W. Scott defines caterans as being 'robbers from the Highlands;' see also Jamieson. - Gael. ceatharnach, a soldier, fighting man; see remarks upon Korn (1) below, p. 814. *CATER-COUSIN, a remote relation, good friend. (F.,-L.)

'Cater-cousin, quatre-cousin, remote relation, misapplied by Gobbo to persons who peaceably feed together; Merch. Ven. ii. 2. 139;' Schmidt, Shak. Lexicon. And see Nares. 'Quater-cosins, fourth or last cosins, good friends;' Coles (1684). Cf. 'Cater-point, in dice, the number four;' Bailey. To go diagonally across a square field is, in Surrey, to go cater-ways, or cater-ing; E. D. S. Gloss. C. 4. In all these instances, cater is from O. F. catre, four, given (with an example) by Roquefort - Lat. quatuor, four. See Four and Cousin.

find: 'A Cater, a steward, a manciple, a provider of cates, ... qui emit opsonia.' Again: 'the Cater buyeth very dere cates;' Horman's Vulgaria. Thus the cates were the provisions bought by the cater, or, as we now say, the caterer, and were thence so called. This is better than deriving cate from O. F. acate immediately. See further under Cater. We may note that Ben Jonson uses the full form acates. Staple of News, Act i, sc. 1, 1. 16. *CAVE IN. (O. Low G.) The etymology of this expression is not given in the body of the work. Wedgwood is certainly right about it. He shews that cave is here a corruption of calve (the pronunciation of cave being formerly much the same as that of the modern pronunciation of calve). 'Properly to calve in, as it is still pronounced in Lincolnshire. It is said of a steep bank of earth at which men are digging, when a portion of the wall of earth separates and falls in upon them, the falling portion being compared to a cow dropping her calf.' He then cites 'the rock calved in upon him;' a. comin'; Peacock's Linc. Gloss. E. D. S. s. v. cauf. He suggests that the word was introduced by Dutch navvies (which is almost certain), and adds: 'This explanation of the expression is rendered certain by the W. Flanders inkalven, used in exactly the same sense. De gracht kalft in, the ditch caves in .- De Bo, W. Flem. Dict.' More than this, the phrase occurs in E. Friesic, and Koolman cites kalfen, to calve as a cow, also to fall in, as in de slotskante kalfd in, the brink of the ditch caves in; and further, kalferen in E. Friesic means (1) to cave in (2) to skip like a calf. See Calf.

CELANDINE. Spelt salandyne, Book of St. Albans (1486), fol. b 4, back. Halliwell explains salandyne as chalcedony, but in this passage it is the name of a herb. CEMETERY. Spelt cemitory, Will of Hen. VI.; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 298.

CHAGRIN. The connection between the two senses of F. chagrin is curiously exemplified in North's Examen, 1740, p. 394. He tells us that certain plotters 'take into familiarity thoughts which, before, had made their skin run into a chagrin.'

CHAIN; see Catenary (above). *CHAMPAK, a tree. (Skt.) 'The champak odours fail;' Shelley, Lines to an Indian Air, 11.-Skt. champaka, a tree, the Michelia champaka of Linnæus (Benfey).

CHAP. Cf. Chap (in commerce) a chapman, or customer;'

Bailey, ed. 1745. CHAPEL. I have here copied Brachet; Littré seems to take the same view. There is another theory, that capella meant a little cape, a hood, and hence a canopy, the canopy over the sacred elements (as in Diefenbach, Supp. to Ducange), and hence generally a recess in a chapel for an altar, or the chapel itself. It is a question of historical origin; it makes no difference to the etymology. CHAPERON. The orig, use of this word as masculine is curiously illustrated by the fem. form chaperon-ess in Webster, Devil's Law Case, i. 2 (1623).

CHAR (2), l. 4. In calling chore a modern Americanism (which it is, see Miss Wetherell's novel called Queechy, ch. 25), I by no means meant to imply that it is not also an old word in English. An American reader has kindly sent me the following quotation : 'God knows how to make the devil do a good choar for a saint;' A Prospect of Divine Providence, by T. C., M.A., London, 165-, p. 379. I dare say other instances may easily be found; in fact, I have already given chewre from Beaumont and Fletcher. CHARCOAL. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, derives charcoal from chark, 'an old word for to burn wood (Bailey).' On the contrary, I should derive chark from charcoal, as being shortened from it. We have nothing to shew that chark is 'an old word;' whilst, on the other hand, we already find the spelling charcole, in the Prompt. Parv. (1440), Palsgrave (1530), and in the Awnturs of Arthur, st. 35 (15th cent.); also charcoill in Rauf Coilyear, l. 322, ab. 1475

CHASTISE. See further in Mätzner. The sb. chastisement occurs in the Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 17, l. 2; and chastisinge in Gower, C. A. ii. 44. *CHATELAINE. A derivative of F. château is châtelaine, used instead of chaine châtelaine, a chain to which keys, &cc. are suspended, orig. a chain to which a warder or castellan fastened his keys. Here châtelaine is fem. of châtelain, adj.; from châtelain, sb., a keeper of a castle = Low Lat. castellanus, adj., from L. castellum, a castle.

CHECK. Not (F., - Pers.), but (F., - Arab., - Pers.). Devic, in the Supp. to Littre, explains how the Pers. shah, king, passed into the F supp. c. eschae. It was because the word was not borrowed -3. directly, but through the medium of Arabic. [He

F. eschac represents Arab. esh-shah, the king, where •CATES, provisions. (F.,-L.) In Baret's Alveary, 1580, we can is for al, the definite article, I being assimilated to at ; and entrated was the ejaculation used when the king was in danger, i. e. check signifies (mind) the king ! This argument I reject, for the e is merely prosthetic.] A better proof that the word passed through Arabic s. that the final & of the Pers. shak was pronounced hard by the Arabs, almost as hard g, and this gave rise to the final c of O. F. eschac. OHEEK. The Swedish word is properly käk, with the sense of

'jaw' only

CHEMISE. Not (F., -L., -Arab.), but (F., -L., -C.?). The Arab. gamis is not Semitic, but merely borrowed from the Lat. camine. a word of doubtful origin. (A.L.M.) Isidore of Seville, who is not much to be depended on, connects it with cama, a bed, or couch, a word used by him only, as in the following passage: 'comusions uocari, quod in his dormimus in camis, id est stratis nostris;' Origines, 19, 22. 29 (Lewis and Short). It first appears in St. Jerome (id.). Cam-isia is certainly allied to cam-era, and to the Goth. hamon, to clothe, G. hem.d, a shirt, &c.; see Fick, iii. 64. It is probably of Celtic origin; the O. Irish form being caimmse, and the O. Welsh camse; see Zeuss, Gramm. Celtica, 1853, ii. 749.

*CHEQUE. A modern spelling of check, from a connection (which is real) with the word exchequer. For the etymology, see Check. CHEQUER, Cf. 'I vestiment d'un drap de soye chekere ove furrore,' I vestment of cloth of silk chequered with fur; Will of Lady

Clare (1355); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 25. CHERT. The etymology given is illustrated by comparing Swed. dial. kart, a pebble, perhaps borrowed, like the E. word, from the Celtic. Rietz assigns no etymology for it; and it does not seem to be Teutonic.

CHERUB. Perhaps not a genuine Heb. word. It is ably discussed by Cheyne, Isaiah (1881), ii. 272, who connects kerin with the Assyrian kirubu, a synonym for the steer-god, the winged guardian at the entrance of the Assyrian palaces. Possibly of non-Semitic and Accadian origin; see Sayce, in Encyc. Britan. s. v.

Babylon.-A. L. M. CHERVIL. Not (Gk.), but (L., -Gk.). *CHERVIL, kid leather. (F., -L.) 'Cheveril, roebuck-leather, symbol of flexibility, Tw. Nt. iii. 1. 13; Hen. VIII. ii. 3. 32; Romeo, ii. 4. 87; 'Schmidt, Shak. Lex. 'Chevereil lether, chever-otin; 'Palsgrave. Spelt cheveril in Anglo-French; Liber Custamarum, 83, 306. - O. F. chevrel (mod. F. chevreau), a kid; kid leather. Dimin. of O. F. chevre, F. chevre, fem., a goat, kid. - Lat. capram, acc. of capra, a she-goat. See Caper (1).

*CHEVRON, an honourable ordinary in heraldry, in the shape of a reversed V.  $(F_{i}, -L_{i})$ . M. E. chemeron, Book of St. Alban's, pt. ii. fol. f 1, back. Usually said to represent two rafters of the roof of a house; I think it must, in heraldry, rather have had reference to the (gable-like) peak of a saddle, as there is nothing highly honourable in a house-roof. - F. chevron, 'a kid, a chevron in building, a rafter, or sparre'; Cot: Augmentative form of chevre, 'a she-goat,' id. - L. capra, a she-goat; see Caper (1). In the same way the Lat. capreolus meant a prop or support of timber.

*CHIBOUK, a Turkish pipe, for smoking. (Turk.) Spelt chibouque, Byron, Corsair, ii. 2; Bride of Abydos, i. 8. From Turk. chibúq, a stick, tube, pipe; Devic (Supp. to Littré); chybák, chubit, a pipe, Zenker's Turk. Dict. p. 349. CHICKEIN. The A.S. form being cicen, not cycen, we cannot fairly explain cicen as being modified from A.S. cocc. which could only have given cycen. The right explanation is rather, that cock, chuck (a chicken) and chicken, are all from the same imitative base KUK or KIK, intended to denote the chuckling sound made by domestic fowls. See Chuck (2), and note Shakespeare's use of chuck in the sense of chicken, Macb. iii. 2. 45, and in seven other passages. CHICORY. Not (F., -Gk.), but (F., -L., -Gk.). Spelt cylorie and suckorie in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 23.

CHIDE. Cf. (perhaps) Dan. kiede, to tire, harass, weary, kied, tired; Swed. dial. keda, to make sorry. But the connection is not clear. Note that the A.S. pt. t. is not cád, as said in most dictionaries, but cidde, Mark i. 25, viii. 33. *CHIGNON, an arrangement of hair at the back of the head.

F.,-L.) F. chignon, properly the back of the neck, lit. a little chain, from the projections of the vertebrae (Littre); the same word chain, nom the projections of the vertebul (Latter), the same word as F. chainon, der. from chaine, chain, with suffix -on; see Chain. CHILL. 'Chill, Du. kil, is quite different from M. E. chile, chèle; as to the verb chill, M. E. chillen, cf. Grimm's Wörterb. v. 511; 'Stratmann. It is better then to put aside the M. E. chele, and to keep to chill. I have already given a reference to Trevisa, i. 51, 1. 16, where we find ' for all be chil and greet colde.' But I now observe that the usual form is not the sb., but the verb chillen, for which Stratmann gives three references besides the one which I give to P. Plowman, C. zviii. 49. This corresponds to O. Du. killen. kellen, kilden, or kelden, 'to be chill and coldish,' Hexham. Here

Mr. Sweet comes to our assistance. He observes: 'Chill is generally <sup>(2)</sup> spelling sinder (with s) occurs as late as in Gascoigne, Works, ed. ederived from O.E. [A.S.] cele, which could only give keel*. But eele coele does not exist. The oldest texts write celi, cele, pointing may note further that synder, in the Cath. Angl., is rendered by Lat. cderived from O. E. [A. S.] eele, which could only give *keel**. But eele = coele does not exist. The oldest texts write celi, cele, pointing to *kali**. Chill comes from the West Saxon ciele, cyle;' Philolog. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881. Cf. 'Frigus, ciele;' Wright's Voc. ii. 36, col. 2. See note on Cool (below). CHIMAGRA. Ben Jonson has the pl. chimæræ; Discoveries, de progressu picturæ.

CHIME. Wedgwood objects that, if my supposition is correct, we must extend the same explanation to the Dan. kime, to chime, and the prov. Swed. kimma, kimba, to chime, toll (Ihre); and that these words could never have been borrowed from the English. But they may all have been borrowed from Lat. cymbalum, occurring in the Vulgate version of 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Indeed, Godefroy actually cites O. F. chinbe, a cymbal. Cf. 'chyme-belle, chyme, Cimbalum,' Prompt. Parv. Wedgwood looks upon all the forms as being imitative, and even compares Gk. κύμβαλον, cymbal, with κομπείν, to clang or resound, contrary to the usual explanation of «vµβaλov as a dimin. of KUµBos.

* CHINCHONA. See Cinchona below.

CHINTZ. Not (Hind.), but (Hind.,-Skt.). The Hindustani chait, a spot, is obviously derived from Skt. chitra, spotted, varie-gated, orig. visible, clear; from chit, to perceive. CHISEL. Mr. Nicol remarks that E. chisel is from North F. chisel, not from the form cisel. The etymology given (from Diez) is very forced. It seems much better (with Littre and Mr. Nicol) to take the standard form to be that seen in Ital. cesello, a chisel, answering to a Low Lat. casellum \* or casellus \*, from casus, pp. of cædere, to cut. Diez' sole objection seems to be that cæsus is a passive participle; but the Low Lat. cæsura meant the right of cutting trees, and the objection is of small weight. In section  $\gamma$ , there is a remarkable oversight; for though we certainly use the spelling scissors (proving a confusion with Lat. scindere), it is equally certain that E. scissors is a corruption of cizars, and is, in fact, nothing but a plural of chisel. See Scissors.

CHOCOLATE. For the Mexican chocolatl, see also Clavigero, Hist. of Mexico, tr. by Cullen, i. 433. Spelt jacolatt, Evelyn's Diary, Jan. 24, 1682. Introduced in England ab. 1650 (Haydn). CHOUGH. Occurs in Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, 345. CHOUSE. The Ital. cians (Florio, ed. 1611) is intermediate in form between the E. and Turkish spellings.

CHRISTMAS. The A.S. form Cristes messe occurs in the A.S.

Chron. an. 1091. CHRYSALIS. It is now doubted whether xpuso's is a genuine Arvan word. It may be Semitic. Cf. Heb. khárúts, gold, from the Heb. root khárats, to cut, dig. See Wharton, Etyma Græca ; Fick (corrections), ii. 795.

CIDER. As to the derivation of F. cidre from L. sicera, all the F. etymologists are agreed. As the change from Lat. sicera to F. eidre presents a difficulty, it may be well to discuss it. Brachet's explanation, involving the forms sisre*, sisdre*, is imperfect, since it will not account for the Ital. sidro. The Wallachian forms are tsighir, cigher, cighear (see Cihac's Wall. Dict. p. 294); and, according to Cihac, the Magyar form is csiger. Hence it is probable that sicera was corrupted to sigera * (cf. Ital. lagrima, tear); and that g afterwards gave place to  $d_i$  just as the  $c_i$  (hard) gave place to tin the O. F. citre, cider, as cited by Littré. On the other hand, Diez gives O. Span. sizra, from Lat. sicera, whence (probably) Span. sizdra* (with excrescent d), and finally sidra.

CIGAR. Spelt seegar in 1730; see N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 26. CINCHONA. Not 'Peruvian,' but really 'Spanish.' Although quinine is of Peruvian origin, Cinchona is not so. The usual account is quite true. Linnæus, in 1742, named the Peruvian bark Cinchona after the countess of Chinchon; he should rather have spelt it Chinchona, but probably thought the initial ch awkward in a Latinised word, especially as the Span. ch is like E. ch in chin. The countess was cured in 1638. See A Memoir of the Lady Ana de Osorio, Countess of Chinchon and Vice-queen of Peru; by C. R. Markham, 1874. Also a note on p. 33 of Peruvian Bark, by the same author, 1880, where he says that 'quina signifies "bark" in Quichua [Peruvian], and quinquina is a bark possessing some medical property. Quinine is derived from quina, [but] chinchonine from chinchona. Spaniards corrupted the word quina into china, and in homeopathy the word china is still retained. In 1735, when M. de la Condamine visited Peru, the native name of quina-quina was almost entirely replaced by the Spanish term casearilla, which also means bark.

CINDER. 'Scoria, sinder ;' Wright's Voc. ii. 120, col. 1 (8th century). Wedgwood seems to derive the Icel. sindr, slag, from the Icel. verb sindra, to glow; but this is a weak verb, and of course the etymology runs the other way. Sindra, to glow or sparkle like the slag in a forge, is a mere outcome of sindr, the substantive. The the purpose. See Liddell and Scott; Lightfoot, Philippians, p.

scoria, and in the Prompt. Parv., pp. 78, 456, by casma, or casma (=Gk. καύσιμα, combustibles?). The word was gradually confused with F. cendres, but even now we cannot translate les cendres de nos pères by ' the cinders of our fathers.'

CINNABAR. This word seems to have been confused with sinople, q. v. It is difficult to say in every case to which word the form einoper belongs. Caution is therefore necessary. CINNAMON. The Heb. qinnámin is not Semitic, but a loan-word; in Malay, it is kájú mánis, sweet wood, from kájú, wood, mánis, sweet. See Speaker's Commentary, Exod. xxx. 23; Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed. p. 751; Weigand, s. v. Zimmet. A. L. M. CIRCUIT. M. E. circuit, Chaucer, Kn. Tale, 1029; cyrcuyt,

i. 33, l. 32. CLAN. Not (C.), but (C., -L.). The Gael. clann, Irish cland, like W plant. children) from are not Celtic words, but borrowed (like W. plant, children) from Lat. planta, a slip, scion, cutting, &c. See Plant. The facts that Irish cland = W. plant, and that both are from Lat. planta, are Dointed out in Rhŷs, Welsh Philology; see cland in Index.—A. L. M. CLAP. Not (Scand.), but (E.). There is no authority for A. S. clappan. We do, however, find the sb. clappetung. 'Pulsus, clapclappan. We do, however, find the sb. clappetung. 'Pulsus, clappetung;' Wright's Voc. i. 45. Also the verb clappettan, to pulsate, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 68, 1, 8. This is sufficient; we may assume a verb clappan. CLAW. Dele section  $\beta$ . Claw is related neither to claw nor cleave; the root is to be found in Icel. klá, to claw, strong verb, pt. t. kló, pp. kleginn;' Stratmann. However, Fick (iii. 52) refers both clew and claw to the common Teut. base KLU, which he compares with Lat. gluere, to draw together (whence gluten and E. glue). \*CLEAT, a piece of iron used to strengthen the soles of shoes; a piece of wood or iron to fasten ropes to. (E.) The radical sense is 'lump,' as applied to a firm and close mass. M.E. clete, a wedge, also clite or clote; Prompt. Parv. p. 81. Allied to Clot, q. v.; from a Teut. base KLUT, whence also G. kloss, a clod; allied to KLAT, whence G. klette, a bur, prov. G. klatte, entangled hair. See E. Fries. klói, a ball, klatte, a cloi, discussed by Koolman. CLIEAVE (2). There may also have been an A.S. strong verb clifan, pt. t. clif, pp. clifen, but it is extremely hard to trace it. The clearest trace seems to be in the infinitive ooclifan, Grein, ii. 305.

*CLERESTORY. (F., - L.) 'And all with clere-story lyghtys;' Amold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. li. 'Englasid glittering with many a clere story;' Skelton, Garland of Laurel, 479. It might as well be spelt clear story, since clere is merely the old spelling of clear. The pl. cleare stories occurs in the Will of Hen. VI.; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 303. So called because it is a story furnished with windows, rather than because 'it rises clear above the adjoining parts of the building,' as Webster has it. 'The triforium, or series of arches between the nave and clarestory are called le blyndstoris in the life of Bp. Cardmey;' Oxford Gloss. p. 57; quoted in Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, note on p. 253. See Clear and Story.

CLERGY. We may note that M. E. clergie was used in two different senses. Strictly, it had the sense of 'learning,' as still preserved in our phrase 'the benefit of clergy,' in which sense it is otherwise obsolete. This I call clergy (1). a. This clergie or clergye occurs in Rob. of Gloucester, p. 420, l. 18; and in Piers Plowman, Clergie, i.e. 'Learning,' is one of the characters introduced into the poem. It answers to O. F. clergie, 'learning, skill, science, clarkship,' Cot.; and to Low Lat. clericia, which reappears in the Ital. charicia, clerkship.  $\beta$ . But clergy (2), with the usually modern sense (common in M. E., as in Rob. of Glouc. p. 563, already cited), seems at first sight equivalent to mod. F. clergé, from the Low Lat. clericatum, acc. of clericatus, orig. 'the clerical y. However, I do not hesitate to office;' Lewis and Short. say that the Low Lat. clericia really had two senses, (1) learning, and (2) the clergy; for it is a most remarkable fact that the Span. clerecia and Port. clerezia (both obviously equivalent to clericia) are not used with the sense of 'learning' at all, but mean precisely 'the clergy, in the mod. E. sense. Indeed, unless Littré is wrong, it would seem that O. F. clergie was occasionally so used also; for, s. v. clergie, he cites ' Toutes gens de religion, tote clergie, tout chevalier et tout gentilhomme,' where his explanation of the word as ' learning' seems to me to be out of place. So also Palsgrave has both 'Clergy, elergie,' and 'Clergy, a nombre of clerkes, clergie.' Hence both senses of elergy are from Low Lat. clericia. B. My explanation as senses of clergy are from Low Lat. clericia. B. My explanation as to how the Gk.  $\kappa\lambda\eta\rho\sigma$  came to mean 'the clergy' is hardly borne out by the texts cited; at any rate, the text in I Pet. v. 3 is not climb. This suggests an ultimate connection with Climb and Clamber, as well as with Clump, as already suggested. It is clear that gramp, clamp, climb, climb, clamber, all belong ultimately to a Teut base KRAP, sometimes weakened to KLIP or KLIB; and cling (A. S. pt. t. clang) is little more than a variant from a base KLAK, allied to KLAP for KRAP.

CLOD. Cf. Swed. dial. kladd, a lump of dough, klodd, a lump of snow or clay. The particular form clod, as a variant of clot, may have been of Scand. origin. Still, there is a trace of A.S. clod in two compounds; see Bosworth.

CLOT. Cf. 'massa, clyue (sic; for clywe?), clottum;' Mone, Quellen, p. 403. CLOTH. On the connection of A. S. cláð with Irish brat or bratt, a cloth, a cloak, see Rhys, Celtic Britain, pp. 207, 209. They are perhaps further allied to Skt. grath, to tie, granth, to tie or bind up; from a root GRAT (Fick. i. 77). CLOVE (1). Mr. Nicol points out that the supposed derivation  $T_{1} = T_{1} + T_{2}$  but (F. = L.). from Spanish is untenable. It is not (Span., - L.), but (F., - L.). It must be a modification of F. clow. We find the pl. clowys, cloves, in the Paston Letters, Nov. 5, 1471 (letter 681); clowes of gylofre, Mandeville, Trav. p. 51; also closes, Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 99; cleves, id. p. 234; clowe, sing., Catholicon Anglicum, p. 68. Here clow = F. clow; and it is not difficult to see that the pl. clowys may have become cloves. Possibly the form clove arose from a misreading of clove, the form in which the F. clou was sometimes written in English.

CLOVE (2). Add: M. E. clove, spelt 'clove of garlek,' Prompt. Parv. p. 84. The A. S. form was prob. clufe; we only find the pl. clufe, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 336, l. 3. Perhaps the etymology is from A.S. cluf-on, pt. t. pl. of cleofan, to cleave or split off. If so, the name has reference to cleavage, and the word cannot be connected with A. S. cliuse or with L. globus. * CLOVE (3), a denomination of weight. (F., -L.) A clove of cheese is about 8 lbs.; of wool, about 7 lbs.; Phillips (1706). The word appears in the Liber Custumarum, where it is spelt clous, pl., in Anglo-French (p. 63), and clauos, acc. pl., in Latin (p. 107). This gives the etymology, and shews that it is identical with cl.ve (I); see note on Clove (1) above. Ducange has clavus lanæ, a certain weight or quantity of wool, which he notes as being an Eng. use of the word. Clavus seems to have meant 'lump' as well as 'nail. CLUCK. The A.S. is cloccian; cf. A.S. Leechdoms, ii. 220,

1. 18.

COACH. Not (F., -L., -Gk.), but perhaps (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.). Spelt cocke in Spenser, F. Q. i. 4. 16. I have unfortunately given the result wrongly. Diez derives F. cocke, in the sense of 'boat,' from L. concka, but, in the sense of 'coach,' considers that it was merely borrowed from Ital. cocchio, which Florio (1598) ex-plains as 'a coche, chariot.' This Ital. cocchio he supposes to be a diminutive form of cocca, a boat, which he takes to be from the Lat. concha, a shell; so that the final result is much the same as before. B. On the other hand, Littré inclines to the supposed Hungarian origin of the word, also pointed out by Diez, from Hung. kotsi. He tells us that Avila, in 1553, says of Charles V.-' Se puso 4 dormir en un carro cubierto, al qual en Hungria llaman coche, el nombre y la invencion es de aquella tierra,' i. e. he laid himself to sleep in a covered car, which in Hungary they call a coach, the name and invention of it both belonging to that country; and refers us to Cabrera, i. 66. The same idea is alluded to in Beckmann's History of Inventions (London, 1846, 4th ed.), i. 77; where it is further said that the name of it was taken from that of a village in the province of Wieselburg, now called Kitsee, but formerly Kotsee. His references are to Stephanus Broderithus, speaking of the year 1526; Siegmund, baron Herberstein, in Commentario de Rebus Musco-vitis, Basil, 1571, p. 145 (where the village is called Cotzi); and Bell's Appar. ad Histor. Hungarize, dec. 1, monum. 6, p. 292 (where the vehicles are called Kottschi). Y. Diez objects that the story will not account for the Ital. cocchio, an objection which is of great weight. Cihac, in his Wallachian Dict., 1870, p. 109, adopts Diez's view, and supposes the Wallachian cocie, a coach, to be related to Wall. ghioaca, a shell, the latter being a derivative of Lat. coclea or cachles. He gives the following forms : Ital. cocchio, Span. and Port. coche, F. coche, E. couch, G. hutsche, Little Russ. kočija, Šervian kočije, Pol. kocy, Hung. kocsi, Alban. kotsi, Wallach. cocie. I may add that Nares, in his Glossary, s. v. Carock, remarks that 'coaches are said to have been first brought into England in 1564, by William Boonen, a Dutchman, who became coachman to Queen Elizabeth.' The Du. koets, which he cites, is merely a Du. spelling of F. cocke. The village

"see is near Raab (Weigand). RSB. An earlier example occurs in the phrase 'curse i. e. coarse wadmol, in Arnold's Chronicle (about 1502), CLING. Cf. Swed. klünge, a tendril, a clasper; klünga, to $ed. 1811, p. 236. See Wad. 1. 11. Cf. also 'homely and course cloth;" Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, b. i. Aristippus, § 4.

COCHINEAL. It should be added that the ck in Span. cochinilla presents no difficulty to the etymology from coccinens. Diez (Gramm. i. 364) instances Span. chancha = Ital. ciancia, facha = Ital. faccia. charla = Ital. ciarlare. In the Span. Etym. Dict. by Monlau (1881), it is explained that the Span. cochinilla, a wood-louse or 'sow-bug. dimin. of cochina, a pig, is a distinct word from cochinilla, cochineal, derived from Lat, coccineus. For an early mention of cochineal, see Eng. Garner, vi. 14; also id. v. 60.

COCK (1). Not (F., - L., - Gk.), but (E.). The A.S. cor or cocc is not borrowed from F. coq, but occurs early; see Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, c. 63, ed. Sweet, p. 459; and see Mait. xxvi. 74. The fact is, that the word is of imitative origin, and therefore appears in the same form in E., F., and Gk. Cf. the extract from Chaucer, already given; also the note on Chicken (above).

COCKLE (1). We find A. S. sch-coccas, acc. pl., sea-cockles, in Ælfric's Colloquy (Piscator). The word is, however, borrowed from Celtic.

COCKNEY. The W. coeginaidd, being accented on the penultimate, can hardly be compared with M.E. cokeney. But M.E. cockney answers precisely to a F. coquind = Low L. coquinatus, and I suspect that Mr. Wedgwood has practically solved this word by suggesting to me that it is founded on L. coquina, a kitchen. We might imagine coquinatus* to have meant, as a term of reproach, a vagabond who hung about a kitchen of a large mansion for the sake of what he could get to eat, or a child brought up in the kitchen among servants. We may particularly note F. coquineau, 'a scounamong servants. We may particularly note F. coquineau, 'a scoundrell, base varlet,' Cot.; coquiner, 'to begge, to play the rogue;' coquinerie, 'beggery ;' coquin, 'a beggar, poor sneak.' This suggests that the F. coquin is connected with L. coquus, as to which Littre and Scheler seem agreed. I think we are now certainly on the right track, and may mark the word as (F., - L.). I would also suggest that the F. coquin, sb., was really due to the verb coquiner, which answers to Low L. coquinare, to cook, i. e. to serve in a kitchen. The transition in sense from 'serve in a kitchen' to 'beg in a kitchen,' is very slight, and answers only too well to what we know of human nature, and the filching habits of the lowest class of scullions, &c. Coquinatus might mean ' attached to a kitchen,' without much violence

 Cockrockes, a kind of insect; Phillips, ed. 1706. 'Without question, it is from the Portuguese carowcha, chafer, beetle, and was introduced into our language by sailors; F. Hall, Modern English, 1873, p. 128. But a friend kindly points out that the E. word is borrowed, not from Port. caroucha, but from Span. cucaracha, 'a wood-louse, a kind of centipede, blatta or short-legged beetle, common aboard of American ships, a cockroach, Blatta americana, L.;' Neuman. I think the Port. caroucha is merely a clipped form of the same word, with loss of the first syllable. The etymology of cucaracha is obscure; perhaps the sense 'wood-louse' points to Lat. coccum, a berry, from Gk. sónsos, a kernel, a berry, a pill; from the shape of the rolled-up wood-louse. Cf. Span. even, a sort of caterpillar, ecco, a worm or grub; words of obscure origin. CODDLE, I have given what I believe to be the right explana-tion of the passage in Philaster. But the extension of the meaning to 'cockering' or 'pampering' has prob. been influenced by prov. E. caddle, to caress, fondle, coax (Leicestersh. Gloss., by Evans, E. D. S.); or the words have been confused. Caddle is precisely F. cadeler, 'to cocker, pamper, make much of,' Cot. - O. F. cadel, 'a castling, a starveling, &c., one that hath need much of cockering and pampering;' Cot. - Lat. catellus, a whelp (precisely as O. F. cadel, F. cadeda, is from catellus in the sense of 'little chain'). Dimin of Lat. catulus, a whelp, which is the dimin. of catus, a cat. See Cat. CODICIL. Perhaps (F., - L.). I find codicell in the Will of which custom came not into England till 30 years after;' Evelyn's Diary, May 10, 1637.

Lady Margaret (1508); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 365. Cotgrave has

CODLING (2). Mr. Palmer calls attention to 'Querdlyage, appulle, Duracenum; 'Prompt. Parv. p. 420. Cf. duracinus, hard-berried, hard (of fruits); Lewis and Short. The connection is doubtful; Palsgrave explains ' Codyng, frute,' by 'pomme cuite.' COFFEEE. 'He [a Greek] was the first I ever saw drink coffee.

COIF. Not (F., - M. H. G.), but (F., - M. H. G., - L.). It has already been pointed out that the G. word is borrowed from Latin. The M.H.G. kupfe, a cap, answers to Low Lat: cuppa, whilst M.H.G. kopf, kopk, answers to Low Lat. coppa, copa. Cuppa, copa, copa are variants of Lat. cupa, a tub, vat ; see Cup. Ducange also gives Low Lat. copha, cophia, cuphia, a cup, a coif; these are merely Latin form of the pl. of quoif, by form of coif; see N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 74. *COISTREL, COYSTRIL, a mean paltry fellow. (F., -L.)

In Shak, Tw. N. i. 3. 43; Per. iv. 6. 176. Put for coustrel, which was the older form. 'Coustrell, that wayteth on a speare, cousteillier;' Palsgrave. From this evidence we may also infer that coustrell was an E. adaptation of the F. word consteillier or constillier, probably formed by the dropping of the last syllable and insertion of r after t(as in cart-r-idge). – F. constillier, 'an esquire of the body, an armour-bearer unto a knight, the servant of a man at-armes [which explains Palsgrave's definition]; also a groom of a stable, a horse-keeper; Cotgrave. The use of the word in the sense of ' paltry fellow' is precisely parallel to the similar use of groom, lackey, kind, &c. The lit. sense is one who carries a goniard. - F. constille, 'a kind of long ponniard, used heretofore by esquiras; 'Cot Variant of Ong spelt cousteau in Cotgrave, 'a knife, or whittle, a sword, or any such cutting weapon.' The s is unoriginal; the proper O. F. spelling is Could or cotel, also culted. - Lat. cultedlus, a knife; see Cutler, Cutlass. The Low Lat. form of coistrel is cultullarius, a soldier armed with a cutlass (Ducange).

*COITION, a meeting together, copulation. (L.) Used by Sir T. Browne of the meeting together of magnetised substances; Vulgar Errors, bk. ii. c. 2. § 8. - Lat. acc. coitionem, a meeting together. - Lat. coitus, pp. of coire, to come together. - Lat. co- (for cum), together;

*COLLIE, COLLY, a kind of shepherd's dog. (C.) 'Ccaly, Coley, a cur dog;' Brockett's Glossary of N. Eng. Words, 1825. Shepherd-dogs 'in the N. of England are called coally dogs;' Recreations in Nat. History, London, 1815. - Gael. cuilean, cuilein, a whelp, puppy, cub; Irish cuileann, a whelp, a kitten. Perhaps from

Irish and Gael. cu, a dog. COLONEL. 'Hee was.. coronell of the footemen, though that tearme in those dayes unuzed;' Life of Lord Grey (Camden Soc.), p. 1; written A.D. 1575, and referring to 1544. *COLZA OIL, a lamp-oil made from the seeds of a variety of cabbage. (F., - L. and Du.) See Webster and Loudon; colza means 'cabbage-seed,' and should not be used of the cabbage itself.-F. colza, better spelt colzat, as in Richelet; borrowed from the Walloon colza, golza, Rouchi colsa. - Du. koolzaad, rape-seed, cole-seed, lit. cabbage-seed. - Du. kool, cabbage; zaad, seed (Littre). The Du. kool is not a Teut. word, but borrowed from Lat. caulis; Du. zaad is cognate with E. seed. See Cole and Seed.

COMB (2), COOMB, a measure. (Low L., - Gk.) The A.S. cumb is, I find, not a fictitious word, but occurs in the sense of 'cup' or 'vessel' in A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 28, l. 9; and again, in the sense of 'coomb' or vessel of certain capacity, in Thorpe, Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, p. 40, l. 5. It is the same as Du. kom, 'a hollow vessel or dish to put meate in ;' Hexham; G. kumpf, a hollow vessel, a trough. Not a Teutonic word, but borrowed from Low L. cumba, a tomb of stone (i.e. a stone trough, and doubtless also used in other senses), which is merely a Latinised form of Gk. κύμβη, a drinking vessel, hollow cup, bowl, boat; cf. κύμβος, a hollow vessel, cup, basin. This is nothing but a nasalised form of cup; see further under Cup and Cymbal. The article, at p. 123, is completely wrong in every way, which I regret. COMBUSTION. Otherwise, Lat. com-burere is trom a form burere* = purere*, allied to pruna; see Freese, p. 219. (Fick, i. 680.) *COMFREY, the name of a plant. (F., - L.) Spelt comfory, Book of St. Albans, fol. c 6, back, l. 1; confery in the 14th cent., Reliquize Antiquze, i 55. (See also comfrey in Britten and Holland's Plant-Names.) - O. F. cumfirie; we find 'cumfirie, cumfirie, galloc,' in a vocab. of the 13th cent., in Wright's Vocab., i. 139, col. 1. Here cumfirie is the O.F. name, galloc the A.S. name, and cumfiria, the Low Lat. name; the last appears to be merely the O. F. name Latinised. By an extraordinary confusion between the written f and long s, we actually find the F. form consire in Cotgrave, explained as 'the herbe comfrey.' [The mod. F. name is consoude (cf. Span. consuelda, Ital. consolida), derived from Lat. consolidare, from its supposed healing powers.] β. The O. F. cumfirie appears to be a corruption of Low Lat. confirma, confirey. We find 'confirma, galluc,' in the Durham Glossary, pr. in Cockayne's Leechdoms, ii. 301; and at p. 162 of vol. i. we learn that the plant was called confirma or galluc. Halli-well gives 'galloc, comfrey.' [Perhaps the change from confirma to cumfirie was due to some confusion with F. confire (Lat. conficere), 'to preserve, confect, soake, or steep in;' Cotgrave.] If this be right, the derivation is from Lat. confirmare, to strengthen, from its Agit, the derivation is non Lat. conformare, to strengthen, non its healing powers; see Cockayne's Leechdoms, i. pref. p. liii, and cf. the Gk. name outpervor. See Confirm.

 *COMPLOT. See Plot (1), p.450; and note on Plot (1) below.
 CONSECRATE. The word consecrat = consecrated, occurs in

ised forms of the M.H.G. words. We may notice quives as a curious & CONSTABLE, 1. 6. For constabulus, read conestabulum; the document quoted is the Chronicon Reginonis abbatis Prumiensis, died A.D. 015; at the year 807. CONSTIPATE. But I find the verb constitute also, in Sir T.

Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 17 b; the sb. pl. constipations occurs on fol. 63

CONTRAST. The sb. seems to have been first introduced, and the orig. sense was 'a dispute,' answering to F. contraste, 'withhas 'contrast and trouble;' Hist. of Eng. p. 26 (1618). Howell (Letters, vol. i. sect. 6. let. 8) has contrasto, from Ital. contrasto, ex-

CONTRIVE. Not (F., - L.), but (F., - L. and Gk.). Dele 1. 9, about the derivation of O. F. trover. The right derivation is given under Trover. The hint came to me from a note (doubtless by Mr. Nicol) in The Academy, Nov. 9, 1878, p. 457; 'we may note G. Paris's satisfactory etymology of trouver = tropare (from tropus, a song), instead of F. turbare, which presents phonetic difficulties, and does not explain troubadowr.'

CONTROL. We find the Anglo-French countrerolleur, controller, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 133, an. 1299; and the sb. pl. countre-roules, counter-rolls, in the same, i. 29, an 1275. In P. Plowman, C. xii, 268, where one MS. has counteroller, another has countrollour.

*CONUNDRUM. 'I must have my crotchets! And my conundrums!' Ben Jonson, The Fox, Act v. sc. 7. It here means a conceit, device. 'I begin To have strange conundrums in my head ;' Massinger, Bondman, Act ii. sc. 3. Again, in Ben Jonson's Masque, called News from the New World, Fact says : 'And I have hope to erect a staple of news ere long, whither all shall be brought, and thence again vented under the name of Staple News, and not trusted to your printed conundrums of the Serpent in Sussex, or the witches bidding the devil to dinner at Derby; news that, when a man sends them down to the shires where they are said to be done, were never there to be found.' Here conundrum means a hoax or a canard. In Ram Alley, iii. 1. 2 (Hazlitt's Old Plays, x. 313) we find: 'We old men have our crotchets, our conundrums, Our figaries, quirks, and quibbles, As well as youth.' The etymology seems hopeless; as a guess, I can imagine it to be a corruption of Lat. conandum, a thing to be attempted, a problem ; somewhat as quillet is a corruption of quidlibet. It might thus be an old term of the schools. For the later sense, see Spectator, no. 61, May 10, 1711.

CONY, CONEY. It seems best to regard this as derived from the French and to mark it (F., -L.). Weigand regards the G. forms as merely borrowed from the Romance languages; cf. Ital. coniglio, Span. conejo, Port. coelho. The best proof of its F. origin is its occurrence in Anglo-French; the forms conil, conyng occur in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 380 (A.D. 1363); conyn in the Liber Custumarum, p. 305; whilst the pl. conis occurs much earlier, in the Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 139. The O. F. connil was sometimes corrupted to connin (as in Palsgrave), whence the G. kanin-chen. Connil is from Lat. cuniculus, said to be a word of Spanish origin; in which case the Gk. súristos must have been borrowed from Latin. The proposed etymology from VSKAN is given by Fick, as cited.

COOL. Note particularly the Icel. strong verb kala, to freeze, pt. t. kól, pp. kalinn. The adj. cool is from the pt. tense. The A.S. celi, cold, sb., is clearly from the same strong verb. See note to Chill (above).

COOLIE, COOLY. 'Tamil kúli, daily hire or wages, a daylabourer, a cooly; the word is originally Tamil, whence it has spread into the other languages [Malayálim, Telugu, Bengáli, Kar-náta]; in Upper India, it bears only its second and apparently subsidiary meaning;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms,

p. 301. *CO-PARCENER, a co-partner. See Partner, p. 423. We find Anglo-French parcener, parcenere, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 155; parceners, pl., id. 45; Stat. Realm, i. 49, an. 1278; Annals of Burton, pp. 471, 480. Also parcenerie, partnership, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 45. COPE (1). An earlier example of the word is the A.S. 'cop, ependeton, in Wright's Vocab. i. 59, col. 2.

CORBAN. The Heb. gorbán is from Heb. root gárav, to draw near, to offer. Similarly the Arab. gurbán, a sacrifice, oblation, is allied to qirbán, qurbán, an approaching, drawing near, from the Arab. root gariba, he drew near; Rich. Dict. p. 1123. CORBEL. 'Chemyneis, corbels,' &c.; Arnold's Chronicle, 150 2

(ed. 1811), p. 138.

CORDUROY. Noticed under Cord. The following should be noted. 'Serges, Duroys, Druggets, Shalloons,' &c.; Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, i. 94, 4th ed. 1748 (Davies). Here duroy certainly seems put for F. du roi.

CORNELIAN. M. E. corneline, Mandeville, Trav. p. 275. CORONER. The first appearance of Anglo-F. coroner is in A.D. 1275, Stat. of the Realm, i. 29; spelt coruner, id. i. 28. This is long before its appearance in the spurious charter mentioned at p. 135. CORROBORATE. Already used as a vb., with the lit. sense

'strengthen,' in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 22. COSTERMONGER. As to the etymology of costard, an apple, I find an excellent suggestion in R. Hogg's Fruit Manual, ath ed. p. 38. He says: 'The costard is one of our oldest English apples. It is mentioned under the name of "Poma Costard" in the fruiterer's bills of Edw. I, in 1292, at which time it was sold for a shilling a hundred. . . Is it not . . probable that it is derived from costatus (Anglicé costate, or ribbed), on account of the prominent ribs or angles on its sides?' This idea, as given by a man of practical experience, is worth having, and needs but slight modification. We may, accordingly, derive costard from O. F. coste, a rib (= Lat. costum), with the usual O. F. suffix -ard (= O. H. G. . hart), as in drunk-ard, &c.; and we may explain it as 'the ribbed apple.' The jocular use of costard (as in Shakespeare) in the sense of 'head," is secondary, and not (as Johnson supposed) original; the name being applied to the head from its roundness, just as it is called a nob (i.e. knob). Mr. Hogg also notes that costermonger = costardmonger; which no one doubts.

COSTIVE, adj. 'Mahn and E. Müller suggest Ital. costipativo, or Span. constipation (which, however, mean "constipating," "con-strictive," not "constipated") as the immediate origin of this word; Prof. Skeat rightly thinks F. constipt more probable (or, rather, less improbable). His remark, s. v. cost, that F. coster is from L. constare, gives the key to the problem. It is, indeed, obvious that a form closely resembling E. costive is F., where it would be come costevé, the Mod. F. constipé being of course a learned word. The loss of the final - of costeve in E. has numerous parallels. as trove (in treasure trove) from trové, prepense (in malice prepense) from purpensée, square from esquarré; and the syllable -ev is so like the common termination -ive (or rather Mid. E. -if), that its assimilation to this was almost unavoidable. I had, therefore, no hesitation in assuming the existence of a non-recorded O.F. costeve as the source of E. costive; and I have since found a 14th century example of the O. F. word in Littre (under the verb constiper), in the plural form costevez. The E. example given by Mr. Skeat, and presumably about the earliest he had, is from Ben Jonson; but I suppose Richardson's quotation from Drant (whose exact date I do not know) is a little older. The word must have been Mid. E., though the earliest instance I know is in Palsgrave (1530), who spells it with the Mid. E. f, and after clearly explaining "Costyfe, as a person is that is no[1] laze or soluble," mistranslates it by F. coulten-geuz, which meant "costly." A phonetic feature which I cannot well account for, in the words cost and costive, is that they have  $\delta$ , instead of u; as the O.F. vowel comes from Lat. ō (constare, constipatum), and gives u (spelt ou) in Mod. F. couler, we should have expected u, just as in custom, Mod. F. contume (costume is Italian) from consvētumina (Class. Lat. -tudinem).'-H. Nicol.

\*COSY, \*COZY, snug, comfortably sheltered. (C. ?) This word appears to have been introduced from Low! Scotch. We find : 'cosie in a hoord,' Ramsay's Poems, i. 305 (Jamieson); and 'cozie i' the neuk,' Burns, Holy Fair, st. 20. It seems to be from Gael. cosach, abounding in hollows, recesses, or crevices, cosagach, (1) full of holes or crevices (a) snug, warm, sheltered. – Gael. cos, a hollow, crevice, cavern, hole. Cf. Irish cos, a fissure, cuas, a cave; and perhaps Gk.  $\kappa i \alpha \rho$ , a hole. Thus the sense is 'sheltered,' from the notion of being snugly coiled up in a hole; which is just the way in ¶ Derived by Mahn from F. causer, to talk which Burns uses it. (from Lat. causari), which is incompatible with its adjectival use and (from Lat. cautar), which is incomparise with its adjectival use and form. But of course Miss Austen was thinking of F. causer when she wrote of having 'a comfortable coze,' i e. talk; Mansheld Park, ch. xxvi. (Davies). On the other hand, cf. Sc. cosk, snug; and cosk, adj. having a hollow beneath (Jamieson). COT. The right A. S. forms are cole and cyte. We also find Icel. kyta, kytra, Swed. dial. kdta, a cot, cottage. The common orig Teut form is KOTA a cot. Fick jii 47

orig. Teut. form is KOTA, a cot; Fick, iii. 47.

COTTON (1). Not (F., - Arab.), but (F., - Span., - Arab.). COTTON (2), l. 2. For 'W. cytenu,' read 'W. cytuno.' We also find W. cytum, of one accord, unanimous; cyttyn, accordant, aiso and W. cyran, of one accord, unanimous; cyrryn, accordant, cyrrynu, to pull together, concur. Cf. W. cy, together; rynu, to pull. For examples of the word, see 'If this geare corten,' in Stanyhurst, tr. of Virgil, b. i., ed. Arber, p. 19, l. 8; also, 'John a Style and I "Play of Stucley (ab. 1598), l. 290, pr. in Simpson's ware, i. 169. The verb cyrano is, however, ac-

the adj. on the y. This etymology must be in which I have not much confidence.

COURTESAN. It is actually used in the old sense of 'be-longing to a court.' We find : 'Maister Robert Sutton, a courtesand of the Court of Rome;' Paston Letters (let. 7), i. 24.

*COVIN, secret agreement, fraud; a law-term. (F., - L.) The Anglo-French covine occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 162, an. 1311. The M. E. covine, covin, counsel, trick, sleight, is a common word, occurring, e.g. in Chaucer, C. T. 606 (or 604). - O. F. coeine. covaine, secret agreement (Burguy). - O. F. covenir (F. convenir), to assemble, agree - Lat. convenire, to come together; see Covenant, Convene. Thus covin = convention.

COWARD. The hare is called 'the coward with the short tayle,' and 'la cowarde ou la court cowe' in the Book of St. Albans (1486), fol. e 5, back; also couart, as early as the time of Edw. L; Reliq. Antiq. i. 134. We also find the Anglo-French courd, a coward, in Gaimar's Chron. 1. 5619; spelt coward, Langtoft's Chron. i. 194; see also the Vows of the Heron, in Wright's Polit. Poems, i. 5.

COWL (1). 'I should think all the words cited must have been borrowed from L. encullus, as certainly the Irish cochal (a cowl) was. Doubtless an ecclesiastical word. The Icel. kuft looks as if it had come through the Irish cockal, the ck becoming f, as in E. laugh. A. L. Mayhew. A more probable solution is that Icel. huff is borrowed (like other ecclesiastical terms) from A.S. cuffe, and that A. S. cufle was borrowed from the ancient British form of L. cucullus. In either case, cowl is not E., but L. COWRY. In H. H. Wilson's Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 271, he gives the Hindi form as kauri, corruptly called courry or course; Bengálí kari, Guzeráthí kori; explained as a small shell used as coin. Four kastis = 1 ganda, and 80 kastis = 1 pan. COWSLIP. The M. E. form is actually consloppe; Wright's

Voc. i. 162, 1. 9; courslop, Prompt. Parv. Cf. Swed. oztagga, a cowslip. The right division of the A. S. word is beyond all doubt; it is written cu slyppan, acc. (as two words) in A. S. Leechdoms, il. 326; whilst in the same, iii. 30, we have the acc. cuslyppen and oxsanslyppan, where oxsanslyppan is compounded of oxsan (for oxan), gen, of oxa, and slyppan, acc. of slyppa, lit. a slop. It cannot be held that slyppa means 'a lip 'l

CRACK. Particularly note the gloss: 'crepante, eraciendum, cearciendum;' Mone, Quellen, p. 331. Also: 'sio corpe call cracode,' the earth all cracked; A.S. Psalter, ed. Thorpe, Ps. xiv. 3.

CRAM. There was certainly an A. S. strong verb crimmon, pt. t. cramm, pp. crummen. The pp. occurs; for I find 'Farsa, ácrum-men;' Wright's Voc. ii. 35, col. 1. Also 'Farcire, ácrymman,' id. 37, col. 2; where acrymman is probably merely a misspelling for acrymman, as the gloss is only of the 11th century. Cf. crymb. CRAMP. Cf. M. E. crempen, vb. to restrain, Owl and Nightingale, l. 1788. A weak verb.

CRANE. Both crane and krane occur, in the sense of weightlifting machine, in Arnold's Chron. 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 127. Palsgrave has: 'crane of a wharfe, grue;' and Cotgrave has: 'grue, a crane, CRAVAT. We even find Cravat used in the sense of Croat or

Croatian in English. 'Horsemen armed, like the German Cravats. with long lances;' Lord Nugent, Life of Hampden; see N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 11

CRAVEN, adj. 'Mr. Skeat, agreeing with Mahn, derives this word from E. crave, but, unlike him, adds that it was a translation or accommodation of Mid. E. creaunt for recreaunt, O. F. recreant; Mätzner and E. Müller simply identify it with creaunt. Mr. Skeat says that the Mid. E. word was really cravand, the Northern participle of crave, and supports this by the forms crawant in the St. Katharine of about 1200, and crauaunde in the 15th century Morte Arthur. But neither -ant with t, nor -aunde with aw, is the ending of the Northern participle; on the contrary, they point clearly to O. F. ant with nasal a. The meaning, too, does not suit; craws originally did not mean "begging quarter," "suing for mercy," as Mr. Skeat says, but "conquered," "overcome" al has creaters ham crawant and overcumen is the phrase in St. Katharine. The sense of creaunt (for recreaunt) agrees fairly with that of craves; the form, however, is very unsatisfactory. The hypothesis of assimilation to North E. cravand is inadmissible, as cravand and cravant (or cravaund) are, as just shown, distinct in Mid. E. both in sense and form; and as the O. F. recreant, corresponding to a Lat. form recrédantem, never shows a for its second e, nor v between e and a, cravant cannot come from it. There can, I think, be little doubt that cravant is the O.F. participle cravanté, or perhaps rather its compound acravanté, with the frequent Mid. E. loss of final -é (mentioned before, in treating of costive). As this O. F. word corresponds to a Lat. crepantare, its primitive form, which is not uncommon, was clearly crevanter with e (as in Span. quebrantar, and in F. crever from the simple crepare); but the form with a in the first syllable, though anomalous, is at least as common, and is the only one in the Roland (which, unlike most texts, has e in the second  $\Phi$ syllable-craventer). The meaning of the O. F. word, originally " to break," agrees as exactly as its form with that of the Mid. E. word. We have in the Chanson de Roland, l. 3549, "he strikes him who carries the dragon (flag), so that he overthrows both "-craventet ambur, and Philippe de Thaun [Bestiary, 1. 248] uses diable acravantad to express that Christ, after his crucifixion, overcame the devil.'-H. Nicol. Further examples of the Anglo French forms are cra*vaunier*, to overthrow, Langtof's Chron. i. 394; cravante, pp. id. 406, 484 (and see p. 298). There can be no longer any doubt as to the etymology of this word. CREATE. We find the form create used as a pt. t. as early

1. 4. CREW. (F., -L.) The etymology of this word, hitherto always wrongly given, has been discovered by Dr. Murray. He finds that it is really a clipped form of accrewe, accrue, or acrewe, used in the 16th century to signify (1) a reinforcement, (2) a company sent on an expedition, (3) a company, a crew. Accrewe was turned into a erew, in which a was supposed to be the indef. article. In Holinshed's Chron., an. 1554, we are told that 'the towne of Calis and the forts were not supplied with any new accrewes of soldiers,' and so were lost to the English. Fabyan says that 'the Frensh kynge sent soone after into Scotlande a crewe [auxiliary force] of Frenshemen, vol. ii., fol. 98 (ed. Ellis, p. 444); and, again, speaks of 'a crewe of Englysshemen, fol. 166 (p. 286). This being once ascertained, the etymology presents little difficulty. Accrewe answers to F. accrewe, 'a growth, increase, eeking, augmentation,' orig. the fem. of accrew, 'growne, increased;' Cotgrave. Accrew is the pp. of accroistre, to increase, mod. F. accroitre ; see Accrue. Littré cites ' accru de leurs soldats,' i.e. recruited by their soldiers ; see Recruit, which is a closely allied word. Thus crew is really 'a recruiting,' a band of men sent in aid; hence, a band of men generally.

* CREWEL, worsted yarn slackly twisted. (Du.?) In King Lear, ii. 4. 7. Halliwell explains it by 'fine worsted, formerly much in use for fringe, garters, &c.' The Whitby Gloss. has 'creeals or crules, coloured worsteds for ornamental needle work, &c.' Palsgrave has: 'Caddas or crule, sayette.' The mod. spelling is mis-leading; the old spelling crule renders it probable that the word is from Du. krul, a curl; cf. krullen, to curl. krullig, curly. Cf. Du. krullen van hout, 'shavings of wood;' krullen, 'to curl, crisp, wind, turn;' Sewel. If this be right, the reference is to the twisted form of the yarn; cf. Bailey's definition of crewel as 'two-twisted worsted.' ¶ Mr. Wedgwood says 'properly a ball of worsted'; See Curl. but I can find no authority for this.

CRICKET (2). Wedgwood suggests that cricket, as the name of a game, is due to the prov. E. cricket, a stool, and that the name of the bat used for the game was not cricket, but cricket-staff, as in the quotation which I give from Cotgrave at p. 142. Cricket is explained by Miss Baker (Northampt. Glos.) as 'a low, four-legged stool.' and she refers us to Leland, Collectanea, i. 76. The probability that this suggestion is the right one is much increased by remembering that cricket was, in all probability, a development of the older game of stool-ball, mentioned in the Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 2; see stool-ball in Halliwell. The stool, such as was used by dairy-maids, seems to have been used as a wicket (see Johnson); and the game was popular with girls. If this be so, cricket really represents the wicket, not the β. But it makes little ultimate difference to the etymology; bat. cricket, in the sense of stool, answers to Low G. kruk-stool in the Bremen Wörterbuch, allied to Low G. krukke, a crutch. Cf. also O. Du. krick, kricke, krucke, a crutch, or a leaning-staff (Hexham); Du. krwk, a crutch, also a perch. Whether the cricket was named as being a support, or from its crooked legs (bent outwards, not perpendicular), we may still connect it with erutek and A.S. erice. Palsgrave has : 'Cricke, to bende a crosbowe with ;' where it plainly means a hooked stick used in drawing up the string of a cross-bow. CRIMSON, l. 5. The O. F. cramoisyne occurs in the 16th century (Littré)

*CRINGLE, an iron ring strapped to the bolt-rope of a sail. (Scand.) 'Cringle, a kind of wrethe or ring wrought into a rope for the convenience of fastening another rope to it; 'Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. Prob. a Northern E. word, of considerable antiquity. - Icel. kringla, a circle, orb, disk (hence, simply a circle or ring); cf. kringlottr, circular, kringar, pl., the pulleys of a drag-net (whence the E. sense). Allied to kring, adv., around, kringja, to encircle, surround; Swed kring, prep., around about; Du. kring, a circle, circuit, orb, sphere. Allied to Crinkle, Cringe, and Crank (1). CRIPPLE. The dat. cryple actually occurs in the Northumbrian version of Luke v. 24, as a gloss to Lat. paralytico. We also find A. S. creopere, a cripple, lit. 'a creeper;' this form occurs in St. Swithun, ed. Earle, p. 12, l. 17.

CRONE. The pronunciation of the Celtic words mentioned is too unlike the English. Wedgwood points out a far better suggestion. Crone is also used in the sense of an old ewe, as in Tusser's Husbandrie, § 12, st. 4 (E. D. S.); this reminds him of O. Du. kronie, variant of karonie, an old sheep (both given in Hexham). This Du. word is a mere borrowing from the Picard carone, answering to F. charogne (E. carrion); see Littré. Probably the E. crone was borrowed from the Picard dialect likewise; the form carrion (with its hard c) is also a Norman form, occurring in Anglo-French as caruine, in the Bestiary of Philip de Thaun, 1. 1293. I believe this to be right, and that crone and carrion are doublets, with a difference of accent as in channel and canal, faculty and facility. The sense of 'old carcase,' though not complimentary, is intelligible. Moreover, we thus explain the word crony also, which is the O. Du, kronie almost unaltered. It originally meant an old woman, as in 'marry not an old crony,' in Burton (cited by Worcester); hence, a gossip, &c.

\* CROQUET, a game with mallets, balls, posts, and hoops. (F.) Noticed in N. and Q. 3 S. iv. 349, 439, v. 494 (1863, 1864). To croquet a ball is to drive it away by a smart tap upon another ball placed in contact with it; and hence the name. The spelling is the same as that of F. croquet, a crisp biscuit, so named from its being crunched between the teeth; from F. croquer, 'to croake, creake, crack, crash, crackle, as a bone which a dog breaks;' Cotgrave. In the game, croquet means 'a sharp tap, smart blow,' as shewn by the Walloon croque, a blow, fillip, jerk, and croquer, to fillip (see Sigart). This Walloon croque is the same as F. croc, a cracking or crunching sound, and croquer is, literally, to crack. These are words of imitative origin, and a mere variation of crack, from the imitative  $\checkmark$  KARK, no. 59, p. 732. Cf. the E. phr. 'to hit it a crack.' CBOSS. Instead of (F., -L.), read (Prov., -L.). There are two

M. E. forms of the word, crois and cros; the former is obviously derived from O. F. crois, a cross, from Lat. acc. crucem. But this will not account for the form eros, and consequently, the derivation of the mod. E. cross has long been a puzzle. Stratmann compares E. cros with Icel. kross, but this is not to the purpose; for the word kross is merely a borrowed word in Icelandic, and I think it obvious that the Icel. kross was borrowed, like some other ecclesiastical terms, directly from English. Vigfusson remarks that the earliest poets use the Latin form, so that in the Edda we find helgum crúci; but later the word kross came in, clearly (in my opinion) as a borrowing from English and not as a mere modification of cruci or crucem. It remains to point out whence we borrowed this remarkable form. My solution is, that we took it directly from Provençal, or Southern French, at the time of the first crusade, about A.D. 1097. The form cros occurs as early as in Layamon, l. 31386, and in the very early Legend of St. Katharine, l. 727; but a much earlier example occurs in the Norman Chronicle of Geoffrey Gaimar (ed. Wright, l. 2833), who seems to introduce it as an E. word. The date of this is about 1150, and I take it to be a very early instance. The word when once caught up would soon spread rapidly and far, from the nature of the case. That this is the right solution appears to be fully confirmed by the fact that crusade is also Provençal; see remarks on Crusade below. Accordingly, the etymology of cross is from Prov. cros or crotz, a word in early use; see Bartsch, Chrestomathie Provençale. Lastly, the Prov. cros is from the Lat. crucem, acc. of cruz, or possibly from the nom. cruz itself. I hope this solution may decide a point of some difficulty. As the quotation from Gaimar cannot fail to be of interest, I give it at length; note that he also employs the form croiz, which is the Northern F. or Norman form. He is speaking of the death of Elle. (Ælla), and he says of the place where the king fell, that 'Elle-croft est ore appele ; Devers le west une croiz y ad ; En milu d'Engletere estad: Engleis l'appelent Elle-cros.' I. e. 'it was afterwards called Elle-croft; towards the west there is a cross; it was in the midst of England, and the English call it Elle-cross.' We thus learn that a place called 'Ælla's croft' afterwards had a cross set up near it, which came to be called 'Ælla's cross.'

CROTCHET. M. E. crockst, apparently as a musical term; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 83; Towneley Mysteries, 116. CROUCH. Cf. also 'Knyghtes crowkep hem to, and cruckep full lowe ;' P. Plowman's Crede, 1. 751.

CROWD (2). See the remarks upon the Low Lat. chrotta, a crowd, W. crwth, &c. in Rhys, Lectures on W. Philology, p. 118. He also cites Irish cruit, a fiddle, also a hump; and shews that the instrument was named from its shape, the word being allied to Gk. suprós, curved, arched, round, humped, convex. See Curve. And see Bote (2), which is the same word. Doublet, rote (2).

CRUET. M. E. cruet, Prompt. Parv.; Joseph of Arim. 1 285; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 84, note 4; Paston Letters, i. 470 (A.D. 1459); Gesta Romanorum, p. 180. Anglo-F. cruet, in the Will of the Black Prince, as noted by Way. Dimin. of O. F. cruye, a pitcher of already suggested. • ORUMPET, a kind of soft bread-cake. (W.) In Todd's

Johnson. Prob. an E. corruption of W. crempog, also crammwyth, a pancake or fritter. (D. Silvan Evans.) This is much more likely than Todd's derivation from A. S. crompekt, wrinkled, which is merely an adj., and much the same as E. crumpled.

CRUSADE. Instead of (F., - Prov., -L.), I think we may read (Prov., - L.). Though the word crusade does not appear in literature, I think we may safely suppose that it dates, in popular speech, from the time of the crisades. In the quotation given from Bacon, the spelling croisado is evidently a mere adaptation of F. croisade, which again is a word adapted to F. spelling from the Prov. crosada, by turning the o of the Prov. form eros into the o of the F. croix. But the spelling of the E. word points directly to the Prov. erosada itself, and was (I believe) introduced directly from Provençal in company with the remarkable form cross; see remarks on Cross (above). Further, the Prov. crosada does not seem to have meant is properly formed as if from the fem. of a pp. of a verb crossart, to mark with a cross, to cross, from the sb. cros, a cross.

CRUSTY, ill-tempered. (E.?) Under Crust, I have given a reference for crusty to Beaumont and Fletcher, Bloody Brother, iii. 2. It occurs also in the play of Cambyses (ab 1561), in Hazlitt's Old Plays, iv. 184, last line. I feel disposed to accept Mr. Palmer's explanation, in his Folk-Etymology, that crusty is nothing but another form of cursty, i. e. 'cuist-like.' since curst has the precise sense of ill-tempered, not only in Shakespeare, but even as early as in the Cursor Mundi, 1. 19201. Curst is for cursed, pp. of curse, q.v. We even find crust as a term of abuse, as: 'What an old crust it is !' A Merry Knack to Know a Knave, in Hazlitt's Old Plays, vi. 539, last line. See Curse.

CUB, 1. 4. Dele 'cf. W. cenau, a whelp, from ci, a dog;' the W. cenaw (not cenaw), properly means 'offspring,' and is more likely to be related to W. cene .1, generation, kindred.

* CUBEB, the spicy berry of a tropical plant. (F., - Span., -Arab.) Spelt quybybes, pl., in Mandeville, Trav. p. 50; the Lat. text has cubeba. Spelt cububes, pl., in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. Mentioned, under the Anglo-French form cubibes, pl., in the Liber Albus, p. 230. - F. cubebe, pl. cubebes, 'cubebs, an aromaticall and Indian fruit;' Cotgrave. - Span. e. beba, fem. sing. - Arab. kabábat, pl. kabábak, cubeb, an aromatic; Rich. Dict. p. 1166. See also Devic, Supp to Littré.

CUD. Wedgwood objects that the cud is not food chewed over again, being swallowed in the first instance without chewing, and he identifies cud and quid with 'lcel. quidr, the paunch or maw.' The new edition of Bosworth's Dict. gives numerous forms, viz. cwudu, curuda, cureodo, curidu, cudu, and this A.S. term was applied not only to the cud, but to ma tich, which is certainly allied to masticate. See A.S. Leechdoms, ii. 54, 56, 66, 118, 178, 182, 192, 270, 308; iii. 72, 124, 134. Since i passes into eo, and wi into wu (whence u), the oldest form is cwidu, gen. cwidewes or cwidwes (base KWIDWA); this cannot be identified with (though it may be allied to) A. S. cwip, gen. cwifes, the womb, Icel. kwiör. At the same time, the sb. cwidu is so far removed in form from the verb ceowan that it is hard to see how to connect them. More light is desired.

*CURTILAGE, a court-yard. (F.,-L.) 'All the comedities (sic) wythyn the seid gardyn and curtelage; 'Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 46 (A.D. 1467). Formed, with suffix -age, from O. F. courtil, 'a back-yard; 'Cot. = Low L. cortillum, an enclosure, small yard, occurring A.D. 1258 (Ducange); also cortile, the same. Dimin. of Low L. cortis, a court-yard; see Court (1).

CUSTARD. For the loss of r, cf. buskin, put for bruskin. CUSTOM. See Costume, where the Low Lat. costuma is differently and more simply accounted for; it seems quite sufficient to take costuma as merely shortened from consuetudinem. Cf. F. amertume, bitterness, from amaritudinem, and enclume, an anvil, from incudinem. See Scheler and Brachet.

CUTLER. Anglo-French coillere, Liber Custumarum, p. 185. CYGNET. The form cisse appears even in Anglo-French, in the Bestiary of Philip de Thaun, l. 1000. Some suppose that Low Lat. cecinus is derived, after all, from Gk. núnvor; see Diez, 4th ed. p. 714. CYPRESS (2). Not (L.), but (F., -L.). I have now no doubt that the E. cipres, explained as 'a fine curled linnen' in Minsheu (1627), and equated by him to O. F. crespe, Lat. byssus crispata, is nothing but an E. travesty of the O. F. cresp, whence mod. E. crape. It will be observed that both Palsgrave and Cotgrave explain crespe by 'cypress' or 'cipres.' The word occurs as early as in P. Plowman,

"here it is spelt cipres and cypirs. I suppose that O. F. lated as crisp (correctly), that crisp became crips, and as cipres. The form crips for crisp is noted under stone ware (Roquefort); which I think is plainly from Du. kruik, as & Crisp, q. v. Another form is Lowl. Sc. kirsp. fine linen, used by already suggested. with some of the same illustrations, is given in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. It occurred to me quite independently. I doubt if Lat. cyperus has anything to do with it.

CZAR. Not (Russ.), but (Russ., - L.) The argument quoted from the Eng. Cyclopædia, as to the distinction made by the Russians between ezar and kesar, is not sound; two derivatives from the same source being often thus differentiated. What is more to the point is, that it is also wrong. The Russian word ezar, better written tsar, is nothing but an adaptation of the Latin Casar, and the connection does admit of direct proof, as has been pointed out to me by Mr. Sweet. In Matt. xiii. 24, 'the kingdom of heaven,' is, in modern Russian, tsarstvo nebesnoe; but the corresponding pessage, in the Old Bulgarian version printed at p. 275 of Schleicher's Indogermanische Chrestomathie, has cearsivo nebesnoe. Here is clear evidence that tsar is for Cæsar. Consequently, czar is not Russian, but Latin.

DACE. The etymology is proved by the Anglo-French form darces, pl., in the Liber Custumarum, p. 279.

*DADO, the die, or square part in the middle of the pedestal of a column, between the base and the cornice; also, that part of an apartment between the plinth and the impost moulding. (Ital., -L.) So defined by Gwilt, in Webster; see also Gloss. of Architecture, Oxford, 1840. The word is old, and occurs in Phillips, ed. 1706. Like some other architectural terms, it is Italian. - Ital. dado, a die, sube, pedestal; Torriano (1688) has 'dado, any kind of dye to play withall, any cube or square thing.' The pl. dadi, dice, is in Florio. from a sing. dado. The same word as Span. dado, O.F. det; see further under Die (2), which is a doublet. DAFFODIL, DAFFADILL. 'An unexplained var. of Afe dyll, affodylle, adaptation of Med. Bot. Latin Affodillus, prob. late Lat. asfodillus,* cl. Lat. Asphodilus, Asphodelus, from Greek. Another med. Lat. corr. was Aphrodillus, whence F. afrodille. Half-a-dozea guesses have been made at the origin of the initial D: as playful variation, like Ted for Edward, Dan (in the north) for Andrew; the northern article t' affodill, the southern article th' affodill, in Kent de affodill, or, (?) d' affodill (Cotgr. actually has it affodill); the Dutch bulb-growers de affodil, the F. (presumed) fleur d'afrodille, &c. The F. was least likely, as there was no reason to suppose that the F. afrodille and Eng. affadyll ever came into contact. Some who saw allusion to Aphrodite in Aphrodillus, also saw Daphne in Daffodil; already in 16th cent. Daffadoundilly was given to the shrub Darkee Mezereon, as still in the North. Affadyl was properly Asphodelas; but owing to the epithet Laus tibi being loosely applied both to spec. of Asphodelus and Narcissus, these very different plants were confused in England, and Asphodelus being rare, and Narcissus common, it tended to cling to the latter. Turner, 1551, "I could neuer se thys ryght affodil in England but ones, for the herbe that the people calleth here Affodill or daffodill is a kynd of Narcissus." Botanists finding they could not overthrow the popular application of daffodill, made a distinction. In Lyte, Gerarde, &c., all the Asphodeli are Afodils, and all the Narcissi Dafodils. But the most common Nar-cissus in Eng. was the "Yellow Daffodil" of our commons, to which as our wild species "Daffodil" has tended to be confined since Shakespeare; "White Daffodil" or "Poet's Lily" is no longer called a daffodil. Daffadilly, daffadowndilly, &c., are all early variants; they show playful variation, and suggest that this had to do with the first appearance of Daffodil itself. At least all early evidence shows it was of purely English rise.' Note by Dr. Murray, in Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880.

DAINTY. The etymology is confirmed by the use of M.E. deynous in the sense of O. F. desdaigneux, disdainful, which see in Cotgrave; and of M. E. digne in just the same sense; see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 95, note 4. Observe that the word dis-dain gives precisely the same formation of -dain from Lat. dignus.

DALLE, 1.9. Read 'See Dell.' But deal is unrelated. DALLY. The etymology here given is strongly supported by the occurrence of the prov. E. dwallee or tell doil, to talk incoherently. A man in his cups who talks in a rambling style, is said, in Devonshire, to dwallee. 'Dest dwallee, or tell doil?' i.e. are you talking incoherently, or speaking nonsense? Exmoor Scolding, Bout the First, last line.

DAMASK, 1. 6. For Heb. Dameseg, read Heb. Dammeseg (with dagesk forte); Heb. dmeseg is better written demeseg.—A. L. M. DAMP. The Swed. dialects actually have the strong verb dimba, to steam, emit vapour, pt. t. damb, pl. dumbu, supine dumbio : whence dampen, damp (Rietz). The mod. Swed. dimma, mist, haze, was dampen, damp (Rietz). The m formerly dimba, as in Widegren.

DANGLE. Cf. also Swed. danka, to saunter about, and the of cf. daffielike, fittingly, becomingly, Orm. 1215. A. S. daft, as seen in phrase sld dank, to be idle.

DASTARD. Rietz gives Swed. dial. dasa, to lie idle, daska, to be lazy, dasig, idle. Godefroy gives O. F. daser, to dream.

DATE (2). Adarulos, a date, is not a genuine Gk. word, but was confused with the Gk. Edurulos, a finger, in popular etymology, from an imagined likeness between the date and the end of a finger. It is of Semitic origin; in Wharton's Etyma Græca, it is called Phcenician. Cf. Arab. dagal, which Richardson (Dict. p. 679) ex-plains by 'the worst kind of dates ;' also Heb. diglia, proper name, said to mean palm tree' in Smith, Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Diklak; and see Speaker's Comment. Gen. x. 27. The Anglo-French dates, pl., occurs in the Liber Albus, p. 224.

DAUB. Mr. Nicol's etymology of daub, given at p. 153, is clinched by the fact that, in the Liber Custumarum, we have the Anglo-French form daubours, pl. daubers, at p. 99, whilst at p. 52 the Lat. form is dealbatores.

*DEAL (3), a thin plank of timber. (Du.) At p. 154, this word is identified with deal (1), which is a mistake. The word is not E., but Dutch. 'Xvj. deles' are mentioned A. D. 1400; N. and Q. 6 S. viii. 300. 'A thousand deal boards to make huts for the soldiers : Clarendon, Civil War, ii. 675. (R.) Earlier, in Florio (1598), we find: <sup>6</sup> Doga, a deale boord to make hogsheads with.<sup>9</sup> - Du. deel, fem., deal, board, plank, threshing-floor (distinct from deel, deal, part, which is neuter). In O. Du. the word was dissyllabic ; Hexham gives deele, 'a planck, or a board' (distinct from deel, deyl, a part). + Low G. with A.S. del, deldeleted, having been written under a false impression. I have there said that the connection of deal (3) with thill is doubtful; but now revoke that opinion, as the words are closely allied, and the exact equivalent of deal (3) occurs in the truly E. word thel, a plank, used as late as 1586; see N. and Q. 6 S. vii. 249. The use of Du. d for Eng. 14 appears again in drill (1), q. v., and in deck. DECANT. Not (F., - Ital., - O. H. G.), but (F., - Ital., -L., - Gk.) See note on Cant (2) above, and on Canton.

*DECEMBER, the twelfth month. (L.) In Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 10, l. 10. - L. December, the tenth month of the Roman year, as at first reckoned. - L. decem, ten. See Ten. ¶ Under November and October, note that the reckoning only applies to the Roman year, as at first reckoned.

DECOY. An etymology from Du. eende kooi, a duck-coy, or decoy for ducks, has been suggested; this Du. word is given in Sewel. I cannot think it is right, for several reasons. In the first place, we should not have dropped an accented syllable; dropped syllables are unaccented, as every one must have noticed. Next, eende-kooi is, like the E. duck-coy (given in Todd's Johnson), a com-pound word of which the essential part kooi appears to me to be nothing but a borrowing from French, or, not improbably, from English, so that we are taken back to the same original as before. Kooi is O. Du. loye, ' a cage, or a stall ; also, a cabin or sleeping-place in a ship,' Hexham. Surely not a Du. word, but mere French. The derivation of accoy in Spenser is obvious; and we must remember that the verb to coy, in English, is older than 1440. I merely quoted 'coyyn, blandior,' from the Prompt. Parv., because I thought it amply sufficient; but it is easy to add further evidence. We also find, at the same reference: ' Coynge, or styrynge to done a werke, Instigacio;' which is very much to the point. Again, Palsgrave has 'I coye, I styll or apayse, Ie acquoyse; I can nat coye hym, je ne le puis pas acquosser. In the Rom. of the Rose, 1. 3564, we find : 'Which alle his paines mighte accois.' i. e. alleviate. 'As when he coyde The closed nunne in towre,' said of Jupiter and Danae; Turbervile, To a late Acquainted Friend. Hence the sb. coy or decoy, and the verb to decoy, which appears to be earlier than duck-coy. See coy-duck in Davies, Supplementary Glossary. I adhere to the derivation given, which will, I think, be acquiesced in by such as are best acquainted with the use of the M.E. word. See striking examples of coy, verb, to court, to entice, in Todd's Johnson. If the Du. derivation be held, then the word is (Du., -F., -L.).

DEFAME. Put for diffame, as already said; the Anglo-French pp. pl. diffames, defamed, occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 386, an.

1364. DEFAULT. However, the insertion of the l (which is a true part of the word) occurs early, in the Anglo French defaite, Year-

Books of Edw. I., i. 303; defaulte, id. ii, 5; but defaute, id. i. 7. *DEFT, neat, dexterous. (E.) In Chapman, tr. of Homer's Iliad, b. i. l. 11 from end. The adv. defily is commoner; Macb. iv. 1. 68. M.E. da/t, deft,(1) becoming, mild, gentle,(2) innocent, whence the sense of 'foolish,' as in prov. E. daft; Ormulum, 2175, 4610; Bestiary, 37; gedafte, mild, gentle, meek, Matt. xxi. 5; gedaftlice, fitly, season-ably, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, ed. Sweet, p. 97, 1. 15; and see 1. 17. Cf. also daftan, and geodaftan, to prepare, Æll. Hom. i. 212, 362. The t is merely excrescent, and disappears in prov. E. and M. E. daff, daffe, a foolish person, P. Plowman, B. i. 138; formed from the base daf-, to fit, appearing in A. S. ge-daf-en, fit (Grein), the pp. of a lost strong verb ge-dafan or dafan, to fit, suit. + Du. deftig, grave, respectable, genteel; Low G. deftig, fit, good, excellent. + Goth. ga-dofs, ga-dobs, fitting, fit; from ga-daban, to happen, befall, to be fit. All from Teut. base DAB, to suit ; Fick, i. 633, iii. 144. Cf. also Russ. dobruii, good ; Lith. dabinti, to adorn, dabnus, beautiful, &c. Doublet, daft, in a sinister sense, as, ' dafte, doltishe,' in Levins. Der. deft-ly, as above; deft-ness. DELECTABLE. The earliest example I have met with is the

adv. delectabely (sic), in Mandeville's Trav. p. 278.

DELTA. Not (Gk.), but (Gk., - Phoenician). The Heb. daleth and Gk. Stara are both from the Phœnician name of the letter.

DEMESNE. In Anglo-French we find both the true spelling demene, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 5, 257; and the false spelling demesne, id. ii. 19. In the Liber Custumarum, p. 353, demesne is expressed by the Lat. abl. sing. dominico, in accordance with the etymology. *DEMLJOHN, a glass vessel with a large body and small neck. enclosed in wickerwork. (F., - Pers.) In Webster. - F. dame-jeanne, 'demijohn ;' Hamilton. - Arab. damjana, damajana, written as damijána or damadjána by Devic (Supp. to Littré), who says that it occurs in Bocthor's French-Arabic Dict. as the equivalent of F. damejeanne. The sense is 'a large glass vessel.' The name is said to be from that of the Persian town of Damaghan, formerly famous for its glass-works; see Taylor, Words and Places. The town is called Damghan in Black's Atlas, and is in the province of Khorassan, not far from the extreme S.E. point of the Caspian Sea.

*DERRICK, a kind of crane for raising weights (Du.) Applied to a sort of crane from its likeness to a gallows; and the term derrick crane had special reference to a once celebrated hangman of the name of Derrick, who was employed at Tyburn. He is men-tioned in Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674, and Mr. Tancock sends me the following clear example. 'The theefe that dyes at Tyburne.. is not halfe so dangerous .. as the Politick Bankrupt. I would there were a Derick to hang vp him too; 'T. Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins of London (1606); ed. Arber, p. 17. The name is Dutch; Sewel's Du. Dict. (p. 523) gives Diederik, Dierryk, and Dirk as varying forms of the same name. This name answers to the G. Dietrick, A.S. Peúdric, i. e. 'chief of the people.' The A. S. beid is cognate with Goth. thiuda, people; see Dutch. The suffix -ric answers to Goth. -reiks, as in Frithareiks, Frederick ; cp. Goth. reiks, adj., chief,

DESCRY. The form is not a good one, and should rather have been descrive. Mätzner refers it to O.F. descrier, but omits to notice that this verb meant 'to cry down, publiquely to discredit, disparage, disgrace, publish the faults,' &cc. (see Cotgrave); i. e. it is the mod. E. decry. Descry is merely short for descrive, due to the O. F. descrire = descrivre. Accordingly, the Prompt. Parv. has ' descryynge, descriptio;' and ' descryyn, describo.' It was at first an heraldic term ; see quotations in Mätzner, and esp. note P. Plowman, C-text, xxiii 94: er heraudes of armes hadden discrined lordes' = before the heralds of arms had described (as usual) the combatants, i. e. pro-claimed their names. The herald's business was certainly not to decry. but the converse. In this passage from P. Plowman, two MSS, have discrivede, descrived; two have discreved, descreved; only one has the clipped form discried. In connection with this word we should note the following quotation from Sir Degrevant, ll. 1857-1860 : ' I knewe never mane so wys That couth telle the servise, Ne serve the metys of prys Was servyd in that sale.' Halliwell explains serve by descry, but the sense required is obviously describe; either scrye is short for descrye (= describe) just as spile is short for despile, or else scrye repre-sents the simple O. F. verb escrire, to write, relate in writing. Either will serve, and both take us back to Lat. scribere.

DESPISE. Derived, not from the pp. despiz (= despits), as given at p. 162, but from the stem despis-, appearing in the pres. pt. despis-and, Stat. of the Realm, i. 162, an. 1311; in the pres. pl. despis-en', Langtoft's Chron. i. 104; in the imperf. s. despis-ayt, id. i. 26; &c. See further examples in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française.

DETRIMENT. Rightly spelt in bk. ii. c. 3 of the edition of the Castel of Helth pr. in 1539.

DEUCE (2). I merely note here that the G. Daus is borrowed from the Low G. dds (Weigand); and the latter is the same as the Du. deus, copied precisely from the Lat. Deus. The A.S. pyrs, Icel. burs, cited by Wedgwood, is a different word; it means a stupid giant, and I know of no evidence that such a being was ever sworn

by. Outzen, in his Fries, Dict., says that the pl. duse meant some of in my lyfe sorer dismayed, jamays a ma vie ne vis homme plus grandesort of demons, but he is vague; and he is not justified in tirg Icel. / yrs.

DIAPER. Not (F., - Ital., -L., -Gk.), but (F., - Ital., -L., -Gk., - Arab.); see Jasper.

DICTION, 1. 3. The derivation of L. dictio from the L. pp. dictus calls for a remark. Dict-io is, more strictly, from the stem of the supine dict-um. But the supine is so unfamiliar a form as compared with that of the pp., that I have, throughout the dictionary, given the pp. form instead. As the stem of the supine is the same as that of the pp., it makes no practical difference.

DINE. Mahn (in Webster) proposes to derive O. F. disner from Lat. disieiunare, to break one's fast; see Dis- and Jejune. The sense is excellent, the contraction violent. Some quotations which seem to point this way are cited by Wedgwood, shewing that O. F. desjeuner and disner had much the same sense. Thus Froissart has: 'Les Gantois se desjeunerent d'un peu de vin et de pain pour tout: quand cestui disner fut passé,' &c. And again, ' J'ay faim, si me vueil desjumer; Delivrez vouz, alez au vin; Et vous, fille, tandis Aubin Alez querre, si disnerons; 'Miracle de N[otre] D[ame], in Ancien Théâtre Français, p. 336. But this supposition is at once set aside by the fact that disnare already appears as a Low Lat. form in the ninth century, as shewn by Littre, and we cannot suppose disnare to be contracted from F. of the 13th century. Littré shews the etym. from decanare to be possible ; for (1) it could become decinare, as is proved by the occurrence of F. reciner (= reconare) in Cotgrave; and (2) the loss of i is paralleled by the loss of the same vowel in Ital. busna (= buccina).

DINGLE. The M. E. dingle occurs in the sense of 'depth' or 'hollow;' as in deopre pen eni sea-dingle, deeper than any sea-depth, O. Eng. Hom. i. 263, l. 14. Without the dimin. suffix, we find A. S. ding, a dark prison (Grein); which perhaps stands for dyng*. Cf. Icel. dyngja, a lady's bower, O. H. G. tunc, an apartment for living in winter. an underground cave. The root is uncertain, and the relationship (if any) to dimble has not been clearly made out. (We also find dumble, a dingle; N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 494.)

DIP. The A.S. dyppan stands for dup-ian*, regularly formed as if from a strong verb deopan*, pt. t. pl. dupon*, which does not, however, appear. The Teut. base is DUP, whence also Deep, q. v. See Ettmüller's A S. Dictionary, p. 566.

DIPHTHERIA. Coined A.D. 1859; see The Times, Dec. 6, 1882 (leader). The form διφθέρα from δέφειν is quite regular, ι being put for e before double consonants; Wharton, Etyma Græca, p. 146. -A. L. M.

DIPHTHONG. So spelt in Palsgrave, Introd. p. xviii.

DIRK. The relationship of Irish duire to Du. dolk, suggested by Mahn, who takes Du. dolk, &c., to be of Celtic origin, is very doubtful. Some suppose Du. dolk, G. dolch, to be of Slavonic origin; cf. Bohemian and Polish tulich, a dagger (which, however, may be a non-Slavonic word).

DISCIPLE. The Lat. discipulus is almost certainly a corruption of disciculus *, which would be a regular formation; see Vaniček. DISCUSS, We find the pp. discusse ( = discusse) in Anglo-French, Stat. of the Realm, i. 328, an. 1352; but it is merely a coined word from Lat. discussus. The sb. discussion is a true form; see Cotgrave.

DISMAL. The frequent occurrence of the phrase dismal day must be noted. 'Her disemale daies, and her fatal houres;' Lydgate, Story of Thebes, pt. iii (How the wife of Amphiorax, &c.); in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 370, l. 3. 'One only dismall day; 'Gascoigne's Works, ed. Hazlitt, i. 404. 'Some dismold day;' id. i. 89. 'A crosse or a dismall daie;' Holinshed, Descr. of Ireland, ed. 1808, p. 24. 'Diesmall, as a diesmall day;' Palsgrave. The earliest example I have yet found is the phr. in the dismale, introduced in Langtoft's Chronicle; see Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 303, 1. 477. Cf. also Span. rentas decimales, tithe-rents, dezmar, to tithe; diezmal, tenth, diezmar, to decimate, to tithe. I believe I am right. If so, no one else is right as to this word. Another observa-tion worth making is that Godefroy's O. F. Dict (though it does not give the adj. dismal), gives a great many derivatives from disme, a tithe, and conveys fresh information. Thus he notes dismer, vb. to tithe, also to despoil (a sense which is truly significant); dismage, right of tithing, dismeor, dismeres, an exactor of tithes; dismerie, exaction of tithes; dismeret, relating to tithes, dismeresse, adj., where tithes are exacted; dismeron, a levying of tithes; dismette, right of tithing. He even has decimal, acij. subject to a tithe. Just as our cheat comes from escheator, so dismal may have reference to the exactions of tithe-leviers. Godefroy, s.v. dismeor, quotes a passage about one of these men who had robbed many good people of their wheat-cheaves souz l'ombre de la dismerie, under pretence of tithing.

Y. The O. F. desmayer, dismayer, occurs in Palsgrave. dismaye, le desmaye, and le esmaye; I never sawe man | vi. 432, 544.

DISPENSE, Il. 5 to 7. After (pp. dispensus), read as follows: Dispendere means to weigh out, hence to weigh out or spend money; cf. Lat. dispendium, expense. - Lat. dis-, apart ; and pendere, to weigh See Pendant. Doublet, spend, q.v. DISPOSE. Not (F, -L.), but (F., -L. and Gk.). See Pose. •DITTANY, the name of a plant. (F., -L., -Gk.) Dictannes groweth in Candy, and ... maye be named in Englishe righte Dittany, for some cal Lepidium also Dittany; ' Turner, Names of Herbes (1548). pp. 34, 47. Also called dittander (Prior). M.E. ditane, detany, Wright's Vocab. i. 225, col. 1; 265, col. 1. – O. F. dictame, 'the herb ditany, dittander;' Cot. Also O. F. ditaundere, Wright's Vocab. i. 140, col. 1. - Lat. dictamnum, acc. of dictamnum or dictamnus. - Gk. δίκταμνον, δίκταμνος, also δίκταμον, δίκταμος, dittany ; so named from mount Dicte in Crete, where it grew abundantly.

DIVE, l. 3. Read: 'A.S. dýfan, to dive. Grein, i. 214. a weak verb due to the strong verb dufan, id. 213.' See Ettmüller. p. 570. DOCK (1). Cf. Swed. docka, a skein (of silk); perhaps a length cut off.

DODGE. It occurs earlier, in Gammer Gurton's Needle. 'My gammer ga' me the dodge;' and again, 'dost but dodge,' i. e. thou dost but quibble; Hazlitt's Old Plays, iii. 193, 254. Florio has Ital. arrouelare, 'to wheele or turne about, to dodge, to wrangle, to chafe

DODO. Not (Port.), but (Port., -E.). After all, this is an E. word. It is merely the Port, form of prov. E. dold, the Devonshire form of dolt; doubtless picked up by Port. sailors from S. of England sailors. See Dolt; and Diez. s. v. doudo, 4th ed. p. 445. Hence dodo, like booby, is a 'stupid' bird. (Cf. dude.)

DOG. CHEAP. Florio (1598) has 'Vil, vile, vile, base, ...

DOGE. Doge is the Venetian form, answering to an Ital form doce *, which would be the regular derivative of Lat. acc. ducen. The usual Ital. duca is an irregular form, due to the Byzantine Greek douna, accus. of douf, a Greek spelling of Lat. dur. See Scheler and Diez.

DOGGEDLY. Occurs in the Tale of Beryn, ed. Furrivall, 1. 1801. DOILY. I now find that there is authority for attributing this word to a personal name. ' The famous Doily is still fresh in every one's memory, who raised a fortune by finding out materials for such stuffs as might at once be cheap and genteel; Spectator, no. 283, Jan. 24, 1712 (written by Budgell). This is hardly to be gainsaid; especially when taken in conjunction with the quotations given from Congreve's Way of the World, Act 3, sc. 10 (1700), and Dryden's Kind Keeper (1679), which last seems to be the earliest example. Steele speaks of his 'Doily suit;' Guardian, no. 102 (1713). It becomes clear that, as applied to a stuff, the name is certainly from 'the famous Doily,' whilst it is probable that the present use of the word, as applied to a small napkin, is (as already said) due to Du. dwaal, a towel, Norfolk dwile, a napkin. Further information re-garding Mr. Doily is desired. Cf. 'Now in thy trank thy D'Oily habit fold, The silken drugget ill can fence the cold' (1712); Gay. Trivia, b. i. l. 43.

DOLL. Another suggestion is that doll is the same word as Doll for Dorothy; this abbreviation occurs in Shakespeare. 'Capitulum, vox blandientis, Terent. O capitulum lepidissimum, O pleasant companion: o little pretie doll poll; Cooper's Thesaurus, 1565. 'Drink, and dance, and pipe, and play, Kisse our dollies [mistresses] night and day; 'Herrick, Hesperides, A Lyric to Mirth, ed. Hazlitt, p. 38 (Davies); or ed. Walford, p. 53. Perhaps further quotations may settle the question. Cf. Bartholomew Fair, by H. Morley, c. xvii., where the suggestion here given is thrown out, but without any evidence. It is a piece of special pleading, in which I have but little faith. Cf. E. Fries. dolske, a wooden doll (Koolman). The usual E. Fries. word for doll is dokke, dok; see Duck (3). Some pretend that doll is short for idol (contrary to the rule that accent is always persistent, so that the short form of idol would be ide), and quote a passage from Roger Edgeworth's Sermons, 1557, fol. xl. to prove it. This passage is given by Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology (note at p. 624), and proves nothing of the sort, in spite of the desperate endeavour made by Dibdin to force the word doll into the text by deliberately misprinting doll for idol when quoting the passage in his Library Companion, 1824, i. 83. This misleading substitution has imposed upon many.

DONKEY. 'Or, in the London phrase, thou Devonshire monkey, Thy Pegasus is nothing but a donkey;' Wolcot, P. Piudar, ed. 1830, p. 116 (Davies). In use between 1774 and 1785; N. and Q. 3 S.

DOOMSDAY-BOOK. The following quotation, sent me by the dumb-bells; Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, bk. ii. c. 2, § 10. This Mr. Tancock, is worth notice. 'Hic liber ab indigenis Domesdei nuncupatur, id est, dies judicii, per metaphoram; sicut enim districti et terribilis examinis illius novissimi sententia nulla tergiversationis arte valet eludi: sic..cum ventum fuerit ad librum, sententia ejus infatuari non potest vel impune declinari;' Dialogus de Scaccario, i. cap. 16; Select Charters, ed. Stubbs, 1881, p. 208. That is, the book was called Doomsday because its decision was final.

*DORNICK, a kind of cloth (obsolete). Spelt dorneckes in Palsgrave. See Cambric. *DORY. See note on John Dory (below).

DOT. This sb. may be referred to the strong verb seen in Icel. detta, pt. t. datt, pp. dottinn, to drop, fall; Swed. dial. detta, pt. t. datt, supine duttit, to drop, fall. This is shewn by the Swed. dial. dett, sb, properly something that has fallen, also a dot, point (in writing), a small lump, dett, vb., to prick (Rietz). This makes clear the relationship to Du. dot, a little lump; orig. a spot made by something falling.

DOUGH. 'Massa, blóma, obbe dáh ;' Wright's Voc. i. 85, col. 1. 'Massa, dáð, vel blóma;' id. 1. 34, col. 2, where dúð is clearly an error of the scribe for dik. The dat. dage occurs in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 342, l. 18. Formed as if from dah*, pt. t. of a strong verb digan*, to knead; this verb has not been found in A.S., but appears in Gothic. To Dr. Stratmann's suggestion that the Icel. for dough is 'deigr, masc.,' I reply that I copied 'deig' (neuter) from Vigfusson's Dictionary

DOWÁGER. The O.F. douagiere, a dowager, actually occurs in the 14th century; Littre, s. v. douairière, cites an example from Ducange, s. v. dongeria.

DOWER. The spelling is very old; we find Anglo-French dowere, Year Books of Edw. I., i. 29, 37; also douayre, Stat. of the Realm, i. 38 (an. 1275); cf. 'Dowary, douaire' in Palsgrave. DRAG. The account here given should rather have been given

s. v. Draw, the primary verb. DRAGOON. Littré gives the date of the sense 'dragoon' as 1585, and the quotations which he gives make it quite clear that the name arose (as already suggested) from dragon in the sense of standard, which is much earlier, as shewn by my quotation from Rob. of Gloucester, and by a quotation given on p. 796 above, s. v. Craven.

DRAKE, last line. The sense is rather 'male duck,' since the suffix came to mean no more than this.

DRAWINGROOM. The full form appears in North's Examen, 1740, p. 67: 'Even the withdrawing Rooms of the Ladies were infected with it.' Cf. 'Leave, leave the drawing-room;' Congreve, Poem on Miss Temple, l. 1.

DRAY. 'Traine, a sled, a drag, or dray without wheels;' Cotgrave. M. E. drey, Palladius on Husbandry, vii. 39.

DRIFT. Cf. Swed. snödrifva, a snow-drift.

DRIVEL. Cf. Swed. drafvel, nonsense; fara med drafvel, to tell stories

DRIZZLE. Note particularly Dan. drysse, to fall in drops, cited under Dross.

DROLL. Dr. Stratmann objects that the Icel. form is tröll; but Vigfusson expressly says that the form is troll, of which 'the later but erroneous form is tröll.'

DROSS. We find dat dros given as an Old Westphalian gloss of L. fax; Mone, Quellen, p. 298. Cf. 'Auriculum, dros,' Wright's Voc. ii. 8, col. 2 (11th cent.); where auriculum is prob. allied to Low Lat. auriacum, put for L. nurichalcum, brass. DROUGHT. Dr. Stratmann objects that the A.S. word is not drugade, but drugad. Both forms, however, are found. 'Siccitas, vel ariditas, drugade;' Ælfric's Gloss., in Wright's Voc. i. 53, col. 2. 'Siccitas drugad, odde Aád;' id. i. 76, col. 2. DROWSY. 'Drowsy, heavy for slepe, or onlusty;' Palsgrave

(1530). DUDGEON (1). We also find endugine. 'Which she taking in great endugine;' Gratize Ludentes, 1638, p. 118 (in Nares, s. v. endugine, ed. Halliwell and Wright). The W. en- is an intensive This prefix; thus enwyn means very white, from gwyn, white. This DUDGEON (2). There is a considerably earlier example of the use of this word. It occurs in the sense of a material (prob. boxwood) used by a cutler. A cutler speaks of 'yuery [ivory], dogeon, horn, mapyll, and yo toel that belongeth to my crafte; ' Arnold's Chron. (1502, repr. 1811), p. 245. Cf. 'swear upon my dudgeon-dagger; Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, v. 271 (1599). DULL. That A. S. dol, foolish, stands for dwol (earlier dwal), is proved by the occurrence of dwollic, adj. in the same sense. 'Nán dwollie sagu,' no foolish story, Judges xv. 19.

DUMB-BELL. The dumb-bell exercise was called 'ringing of explains the name.

DUMPS. 'I dumpe, I fall in a dumpe or musyng upon thynges, le me amuse;' Palsgrave. The root-verb is seen in Swed. dial. dimpa, to fall down plump, pt. t. damp, supine dumpið (Rietz). Cf. M. E. dumpen, to fall down plump, Allit. Poems, C. 362. DUN (I). Also M. E. donne, Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, 334. DUTY. The form is Anglo-French; we find duete, with the sense

b) 11. 'In form is Angle-French'; we find avere, with the sense 'debt, obligation,' in Liber Albus, p. 211. Clearly a coined word.
 DYE. 'Bis tincto cocco, twi gedeägnadre deäge,' i. e. with twice-dyed dye; Mone, Quellen, p. 352. 'Fucare, deagian,' id. p. 356. See further examples in Bosworth's Dict.

EARWIG. But in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 134, l. 4, the word wicga prob. means an earwig, and in this instance may mean 'wag-' i. e. wriggler, rather than 'carrier' or horse. See Wag, wing; and ✓ WAGH, no. 338, p. 742.

EASE. Several correspondents refer me to A.S. edde, easy, the well-known word which appears in Uneath, q. v. It has nothing whatever to do with ease, which is plainly from the French. It is the etymology of the F. aise which is obscure; and, as to deriving the O.F. aise from A.S. edde, I take it to be wholly out of the question. See what Diez has written about the Ital. form agio; also Scheler's note upon Diez, p. 705.

EASEMENT. 'Esement of the kechene to make in her meate,' use of the kitchen to cook her meat in; Bury Wills (1463), ed. Tymms, p. 22. The pl. easmentis occurs in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 138. See Ease. EAVESDROPPER. I find a mention of 'euesdroppers vnder mennes walles or wyndowes by nyght or by day to bere tales' in a book on Court Baron, pr. by Pynson, fol. a 5, back.

EBONY. The Heb. word is hobhnim (hounim); prob. a non-Semitic word. The derivation from eben ('even) is now generally given See Gesenius, Dict. 8th ed.-A. L. M.

ECLAT. The prefixed e is merely due (as in esprit from L. spiritus) to the difficulty experienced by the French in pronouncing words beginning with sp and sk.

*EGRET, the lesser white heron. (F., - O. H. C.) In Levins and Huloet. The Anglo French egret occurs in the Liber Albus, p. 467.-O. F. egrette, aigrette, 'a fowl like a heron;' Cot. Dimin. of a form aigre*, of which Prov. aigron, a heron (cited by Diez) is an augmentative form. This Prov. aigron is the same as F. heron, O. F. hairon, a heron. Aigre* exactly answers to the O. H. G. Neigir, heiger, a heron; and egret (for hegr-et) is merely the dimin. of the her- (= hegr-) in her-on. See Heron.

*ELECAMPANE, a plant. (F.,-L.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xix. c. 5; spelt elycamfane, Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. Shortened from F. enule-campane, 'the hearbe called helicampanie;' Cot.-L. inula campana; where inula is the Lat. name for elecampane in Pliny, as above. Campana, fem. of campanus, is a Low Lat. form, and perhaps means merely growing in the fields; cf. Lat. campaneus, of or pertaining to the fields. (White), though the proper L. word for this is campestris; see Campestral. Mahn, in Webster, explains campana as meaning a bell, and compares the G. glockenwurz. This is doubtful, for the resemblance to a bell is by no means striking, and the G. for elecampane is alant, founded on the Gk. name ¿Aérior (Lat. helenium). In any case, campana is derived from L. campus, a field.

ELEPHANT. Probably from the Phoenician; cf. Heb. 'eleph, an ox — A. L. M. ELEVEN. The equation of Lith. -lika to Lat. decem has freuently been given. But it is much better to connect Lith. lika with the Lith. verb likti, to be left remaining, to be left over, whence the adj. lekas, left over. Nesselmann takes this view, and gives the examples antras lekas, twelfth, i. e. 'second left over' (after ten), treczias lekas, thirteenth, &c. ; and with these he connects the suffix -lika occurring in the cardinal numbers from 11 to 19. (For the root of the Lith. verb, see License.) Similarly, we may explain Goth. ain-lif as meaning 'one left over,' and connect it with Icel. lifa, to be left, remain; see Life. But it should be noticed that the Lith. and Goth. suffixes are from roots of different forms; see roots no. 325 and 307, p. 741. ELLF. The Swed. is alf, also elfva (J. N. Grönland). Widegren's Dictionary only gives elfuor, pl. elves ; elfdans, a dance of elves.

ELIIXIB. Perhaps (F., Span, Arab., - Gk.), rather than merely (Arab.). The M. E. elixir is from F. elixir (Cotgrave), which from Span elixir. And it is the Span. form which is from Arab. el iksir, the philosopher's stone of the alchemists, essence. Devic (Supp. to Littré), following Dozy, shews that the Arab. iksír is unoriginal, and merely a transcription of Gk. ξηρών, dry, dried up (neut. of  $f\eta\rho os$ ), applied originally, I suppose, to the desiccated 3 F withdraw. (F., - L.) 'Eloine, to remove, banish, or send a great way from;' Blount's Nomo-lexicon. Still in use as a law term. Spenser writes esloyne, F. Q. i. 4. 20. - O. F. esloigner (mod. F. eloigner), 'to remove, banish, drive, set, put far away, keep aloof; Colgrave. - O. F es-, prefix; and loing (mod. F. loin), 'far, a great way off;' Cot. - Lat. ex, off, away; longe, adv. afar, from longus, adj. long, far. See Ex- and Long; also Purloin. EMBERS. Dr. Stratmann kindly refers me to: 'Eymbre, hote aschys, eymery or synder, Pruna;' Prompt. Parv. p. 136. This is clearly a Scand. form, from Icel. eimyr,a. Cf. ymbers in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 7 (Chesteyns); imbres, embers, in Palsgrave.

EMBEZZLE. I have now little doubt that the ctymology proposed, and explained at greater length s.v. imbecile, is quite right. Mr. Herrtage sends me a reference which strengthens the supposition. In a letter from Reginald Pole to Hen. VIII., dated 7 July, 1530, he speaks of a consultation in which the adverse party used every means to 'embecyll' the whole determination, that it might not take effect. See Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII., ed. Brewer, vol. iv. pt. 3. p. 2927. Mr. R. Roberts sends me some very curious instances. 'I have proposed and determined with myself to leave these bezelings of these knights, and return to my village;' Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, 1652, fol. 158, back. 'They came where Sancho was, astonisht and embeseld with what he heard and saw;' id. fol. 236. 'Don Quixote emosseia with what he heard and saw; id. fol. 230. 'Don Quixote was embe.eld,' i.e. perplexed; id. fol. 262. Imbezil, to take away, occurs A. D. 1547; see N. and Q. 5 S. xi. 250. 'A feloe.. that had embesled and conueied awaye a cup of golde;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms; Diogenes, § 83. See further examples in Palmer, Folk.Etymology. We may further note the following Angloo-French forms vir build, he following in walking. Life of Edw. (Conference French forms, viz. besille, he falters in walking, Life of Edw. Confessor, 2003; besele, pp. embezzled, Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 453; besile, embezzled, stolen, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 62 (before A.D. 1272). The etymological sense appears in the following: You will not embezzle my servant with your benevolence, will you ?' (i. e. weaken his allegiance, corrupt him); Ben Jonson, The Case is Altered, v. 2. A very early instance occurs in The Newe Booke of Justices of Peas, by Sir A. Fitzherbert, pr. by T. Petit in 1541, where we find: 'Imbesylment of Recordes. Also of those that imbesyll, take away, conuey, or willingly auoyde [i. e. wilfully remove] any Record, or parcel of wryt ... that is felonye."

* EMBLEMENTS, the produce of sown lands, crops which a tenant may cut after the determination of his tenancy.  $(F_{..} - L_{.})$ In Blount's Nomo-lexicon; and still in use. Formed with suffix -ment from O. F. emble-er, embla-er, also emblad-er, the same word as mod. F. emblav-er, 'to sow the ground with corn;' Cotgrave. See emblader in Roquefort, and emblaver in Littré. All these forms are from Low Lat. imbladare, to sow with corn ; whence was formed the sb. imbladatura, produce of sown lands, with precisely the same force as the Low Lat. imbladamentum* (not found) which would be the equivalent of E. emblement. - Lat. im., for in, in, prefix; and Low Lat. bladum (F. bl6), contraction of abladum = Lat. ablatum, as explained s. v. Badger.

Pals-grave has accroche as an E. word.

ENDEAVOUR. 'He sholde endeuore hym;' Caxton. tr. of Reynard the Fox, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 93, l. 21. Palsgrave has: 'I dever, I applye my mynde to do a thing, Ie fays mun debvoir;' and again (under im-, wrongly) he has: 'I indever my selfe to do a thyng, I payne my selfe, I indever me to do the best I can.' 'Ye 'v endevoir yourself;' Letter by Hen. VIII., in Royal 4, i. 240. It is frequently reflexive, as in these ex-

residuum left in the retort in the attempt to attain the desired & Gen. xxx. 20), is unconnected with Lat. induere. But there is as-result. With Gk. typós, cf. Skt. kskai, to dry up ( $\checkmark$  SKA). \*ELOIGN, ELOIN, to remove and keep at a distance, to (1); just contrary to indue (2), which is a corruption of endue (1): (1); just contrary to indue (2), which is a corruption of endue (1); cf. 'I indue, Ie endoue;' Palsgrave. Thus, in Ps. 132. 9, we have 'let thy priests be clothed with righteousness;' in the Vulgate, 'sacerdotes tui induantur justitiam;' and hence the versicle in the Morning Prayer: 'endue thy ministers with rightcousness.' (A. L. M.) See Indue (2)

*ENGRAILED, indented with curved lines; in heraldry. (F,-L. and Teut.) Spelt engrayly in The Book of St. Albans. pt n. fol. f1, bk. = O. F. engresle, pp. of engresler, to engrail: Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave, s. v. ingrailed. = F. en, in; O. F. gresle, F. grile. hail; because the edge or line seems as if indented or 'pitted' by the fall of hailstones. See further under En-, prefix; and the note upon Grail (3) below.

ENHANCE. The form is not uncommon in Anglo-French; we find the infin. enhancer, Stat. of the Realm, i. 393. an. 1371; enhauncer, Lib. Custumarum, p. 219; enhancees, pp. pl., Stat. of the Realm, i. 159, an. 1311. ENJOY. We find the Anglo French enjoier, Stat. of the Kealm,

i. 310, an. 1351.

ENLARGE. Anglo-French enlargee, pp., Stat. of the Realm, i. 398, an. 1377; enlargiz, pp. pl., id. i. 97, an. 1285. - O. F. enlarger; Roquefort. Hence M. E. enlargen, Mandeville's Trav. p. 45; Roquefort. Hence M Palladius, bk. i. l. 316.

ENMITY. Anglo-F. enemite, Stat. Realm, i. 290. an. 1340; enemistez. pl., Langtoft's Chron. i. 353.

ENSUE. Strictly, the F. infin. is due to Low Latin insequere, substituted for Lat. insequi; see Sue. ENTICE. Cf. also Low G. tikken, to touch slightly. The Bremen Wörterbuch also gives 'tikktakken, oft anstossen, reizen;' and G. reizen has the very sense ' to entice.

ENVELOP. We find the simple F. verb voluper in the Anglo-F. phr. se volupe = folds itself up, Bestiary, l. 860. So also Walloon veloper, to form a ball or skein (Sigart); O. Ital. goluppare (with go for w), ' to fould, winde, wrap, roule, huddle vp,' Florio.

EPHAH. Heb. 'ephilk, more usually 'eyphilk, an ephah; possibly from an old Egyptian word of which the Coptic form is din. See Gesenius, ed. 8, p. 38; Speaker's Commentary, Exod. xvi. 36.-A. L. M.

EPHOD. The Heb. words are better written 'éphód, 'áphad; to shew the initial Aleph.—A. L. M. ERMINE. The Anglo-F. kermine (with A) is in Langtoft's

Chron. i. 172; also ermin, Vie de St. Auban. ERRANT. 'A thef erraunt,' Chaucer, C. T. 16173. The Anglo-F. errant translates Lat. transeuntem, journeying, in the Laws of Will. I. § 26; whilst errant signifies 'in eyre,' on the journey, on circuit, in Stat. of the Realm, i. 282, an. 1310; we also find such spellings as eiraunt, eyraunt; see Gloss. to Liber Albus and Liber Custumarum. The vb. errer or eirer, to wander, is from the sb. erre, 'way, path,' Cot.; or from the Low Lat. iterare, from iter; see Eyre. It comes to the same thing. Distinct from Err, but the same word (probably) as Arrant. See note on Arrant above.

ESCHEW. Cf. Anglo-F. eschure, Stat. of the Realm, i. 253, an. 1327; eschuer, Liber Albus, p. 369. *ESCROW, a deed delivered on condition. (F., - Teut.) A law term (Webster); the same word as M. E. scrow, scrow, examples of which are given s. v. Scroll, q. v. It is the orig. word of which scroll is the diminutive.

*EBCUAGE, a pecuniary satisfaction in lieu of feudal service. (F.,-L.) In Blackstone, Comment., b. ii. c. 3.-O. F. escuage, given by Littré, s. v. écuage, who quotes from Ducange, s. v. sustagium, which is the Low Lat. form of the word. See also Roquefort. Formed with suffix -age from O. F. escu, a shield; because escuage was, at first, an aid given by service in the field. See Squire. ESCUTCHEON. Anglo-F. escuchoun, Langtoft's Chron. i. 358. We find mention of 'iiij. scochens of armys' in Fabyan's will, A. D. 1511; see Fabyan, ed. Ellis, p. x. Also the spelling scockon, Book of St. Albans. pt. ii, fol. f 8.

ESSAY. A remarkably early use of this word occurs in the Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 3, pr. in Stubbs, Select Charters, 4th ed. 1881, p. 174, where it refers to the assay of money: 'examen, quod vulgo essayum dicitur' (O. W. Tancock).

\*ESSOIN, an excuse for not appearing in court. (F., -L. and Teut.) M. E. essoine, Chaucer, Pers. Tale, Introd. § 10. Spelt essoigne in Anglo-F., Stat. of Realm, i. 40, an. 1278; also esseyne, Year-books of Edw. I., i. 13, assoyne, ibid. - O. F. essoine (also exoine), 'an essoine, or excuse;' Cot. Burguy gives essoine, essoigne, essigne, necessity, difficulty, hindrance, danger, peril, excuse, reason for not appearing in a court of justice.  $\beta$ . In this difficult word for not appearing in a court of justice. the prefix is certainly O. F. es-, from Lat. ex, out. Soine is related to F. soin, solicitude, and appears in Low Lat. (A. D. 1110) as sonia,  $\overset{\circ}{\Phi}A.S.$  fegan. The form answers rather to M. E. fagen, to flatter, an impediment, excuse for non-appearance. The force of the prefix coax, fawn upon; for which see Catholicon Anglicum. p. 120. is merely intensive, so that essoine = a great impediment, peril, hindrance, sufficient excuse. y. The Low Lat. has also sunnia, sunnis, with the same sense as sonia, and Diez cites an O. Ital. sogna and Prov. sonk as being cognate forms. The Low Lat. forms sunnis, sonies, sonia, sonnis, sunnia, &c. occur in the Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern, Gloss. col. 673. Kern (id. col. 537) says that sunni, (stem sunnia) means a lawful excuse, and that the Icel. form is naud-syn, need, necessity, also lawful excuse. Thus the F. soine is of Teut. origin, from the Teut. word seen in O. H. G. sunna, lawful excuse, O. Sax. sunnea, need, Icel. syn, protest, denial, naudsyn, need, excuse; cf. also Goth. sunja, truth, sunjon sik, to excuse oneself, sunjons, a setting oneself right, apology, defence ; Icel. synjan, refusal. Fick (iii. 326) ranges these words under the Teut. form sonya, real, truthful, truthful excuse. They are further related to Lat. sons, guilty (orig. being, real), and to E. sooth. The root is ✓AS, to be. See further under Sin, Sooth, Suttee. •ESTOP, to bar, impede, stop up. (F., - L.) See Stop

*ESTOVERS, supplies of various necessaries. (F., -L.?) 'Common of estovers, i. e. necessaries, . . is a liberty of taking necessary wood, &c.; Blackstone, Comment. b. ii. c. 2; b. iii. c. 8. [He erroneously derives it from estoffer, to stuff, which is a distinct word]. - O. F. estover, provisions; see Stover. The Anglo-F. estover, sb., sustenance, occurs in the Year-books of Edw. I., i. 19, 21, 231.

*ESTREAT, a true copy of an original record. (F.,-L.) In Blount; he refers us to Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, foll. 57, 76. Anglo-F. estrete, Stat. of the Realm, i. 32, an. 1275. (In the Lib. Custumarum, p. 434. we have the Lat. gen. pl. estractarum.) The lit. sense is 'extract.'-O. F. estrete, fem. of estret, also spelt estrait, pp. of 'estraire, to extract (Burguy). - Lat. extracta, fem. of pp. of extrakere; see Extract. Der. estreat, vb., to extract a record, as a forfeited recognizance, and return to the court of exchequer for prosecution, also to levy fines under an estreat (Ogilvie). Doublet, extract.

EWER. The Anglo-F. Ewere appears as a proper name in the Liber Custumarum, p. 684. It means 'water-carrier' (Lat. aquarius). In the Year-books of Edw. I., iii. 367, we find the adj. eweret, meaning 'working by water,' and applied to a mill; in the same, i. 417, we find the sb. ewe, water. But I have lately succeeded in finding the Anglo-F. ewer in the very sense of 'ewer' or 'jug;' it occurs in a Collection of Royal Wills, ed. Nichols (1780), pp. 24, 27 (an. 1360).

EXCISE (1). Perhaps the earliest use of the word in E. is the following; it occurs in a composition between English merchants and those of Antwerp. 'Thexcise of euery clothe is' so much; Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 197. The etymology is disputed. The supposition that Du. aksiis is a corruption of O. F. assise comes to the same thing as the statement of Ducange, that the Low Lat. accisia, excise. is a corruption of Low Lat. assisia, assise. This supposition, however, is open to a grave objection, viz. that the supposed corruption is one from an easy to a harder form. Hence Scheler and Littré prefer to take F. accise as a true word, and to derive it from Lat. accis-us, pp. of accidere, to cut into; from Lat. ae- (for ad), and cadere, to cut. Littré supposes that F. accise meant, originally, a tally scored with notches; hence, a score, a sum scored, a tax. Cf. E. tally. So also Weigand, s. v. Accise. In any case, the prefix is certainly from Lat. ad, not from Lat. ex.

EXCREMENT. The use, in Shakespeare, of excrement in the sense of hair, &c., seems to be due to a false etymology from excrescere, as if excrement meant 'out-growth.'

EXECUTRIX. Occurs in 1537, in Bury Wills. ed. Tymms, p. 131. Spelt executrice (a F. form) in Fifty Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall. p. 8 (an. 1395)

EXEQUIES. See Exsequies (below).

*EXERGUE, the small space left beneath the base-line of a subject engraved on a coin, left for the date or engraver's name. (F.,-Gk.) The final ue is not pronounced, the word being French. It occurs in Todd's Johnson, and in works on coins. - F. exergue, It occurs in Toda's jointson, and in works on coins. -r. exergue, used by Voltaire, Mœurs, 173 (Littré). So called because lying 'out of the work,' not belonging to the subject -Gk. if, out of; ipy-ov, work. See Ex- and Work. EXILE. The etym. given of Lat. exsul is the usual one, but it is prob. wrong. It is more likely to be a derivative of Lat. salire; cf. exsilium (exilium), and the compounds præsul, consul, subsul. See Lewis and Short; also Vaniček.

EXPOSE. See note on Compose (above).

*EXSEQUIES, the same as Exequies, q. v. (p. 199). The Anglo-F. exsequies occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 224 (before A.D. 1307). The M. E. exequies occurs A.D. 1444; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 131.

FADGE. We must dismiss the connection with M. E. fejen, coax, fawn upon; for which see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 120, note 3. I think fadge may certainly be derived from A.S. fagian, to fit or adorn, allied to fæger, fair; see Fair. This leads to the same  $\checkmark$  PAK, to fit, as before. The A.S. fægian only occurs in the comp. áfægian, to depict; 'ánlícnesse drihtnes on brede áfægde,' i.e. the likeness of Christ depicted on a board; Ælfred, tr. of Beda, i. 25. The changes of sense from 'fit' to 'depict,' and from 'fit' to 'speak fair,' or 'flatter' can readily be imagined to be probable.

FAG-END. The suggestion that fag-end is for flag-end is almost certainly right. It may have been a technical term used in hawking. 'The federis at the wynges next the body be calde the flagg or the fagg federis; ' Book of St. Albans, fol. b. 1. FAITH. The M. E. form fey is due to O. F. fei, whilst the M. E.

form feith represents the O. F. feid, which is the earliest O. F. form, the d being due to L. acc. fidem. On the final -th, see H. Nicol's article in The Academy, no. 435, Sept. 4, 1880, p. 173, where this view is maintained. On the other hand, the fact that -th is a common ending for abstract nouns (such as health, wealth) may account for the change from d to th.

FALLACY. Spelt falacye, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 29, ed. Arber, p. 67, l. 10.

FARDEL. (F., - Span., - Arab.) Besides O. F. fardel, we actually find the curious form hardel, and the dimin. hardeillon, for which see Bartsch; and still more strangely, we find hardell, to pack in a bundle, even in English, in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf  $f_4$ . These forms go far to settle the etymology. They are clearly Spanish, and due to the common substitution of k for f in that language. Consequently, the word is probably Moorish, and the Arabic origin is almost certain.

FARM. Rather (F., -L.) than (L.) I greatly doubt the connection with A. S. feorm, a feast, though the connection has often been asserted. Even the A. S. feormere is rather 'purveyor' than 'farmer;' besides which, the A. S. feorm is prob. Teutonic, and independent of Lat firma. The M. E. ferme occurs first (perhaps) in Rob. of Glouc. p. 378, in the phr. sette to ferme = let on lease. The Anglo-F. ferme occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 140, an. 1300. - F. ferme, a farm, occurring in the 13th cent.; see Littré; cf. F. à ferme, on lease. - Low Lat. firma, a farm; also, a fixed sum paid as rent (Ducange). Cf. Low Lat. firmitas. a security, surety. - Lat. firma, fem. of firmus, firm, hence secure, fixed. See Firm. ¶ Ducange also gives firma, a feast, repast, but only as occurring in E. writers. This must be the A. S. feorm Latinised; we find the M. E. dat. case ferme in the phr. 'at ferme and at feste;' Reliquize Antiquæ, i. 131, l. 33. Confusion between the two words was easy. Dor. farmer, M. E. fermour, Chaucer, Leg. of Good Women, prol. 378; 'Fermoure, firmarius;' Prompt, Parv. The F. suffix our shews the F. origin of the word.

FARRIER. Spelt ferrour in Anglo F.; Stat. of the Realm,

. 311, an. 1351. FARROW. Add: 'M. E. fargen; the pp. ivarged occurs in the Ayenbite of Inwyt. p. 61, l. 29; spelt inerwined, p. 204, l. 12.' FATHERLAND. In Trench, Eng. Past and Present, 4th ed. p. 74, fatherland is said to be from G. vaterland. Surely this is a mistake. In his Curiosities of Literature, in the chapter on the History of New Words, I. D'Israeli distinctly tells us that he himself introduced the word into English, and that it was suggested to him by the Du. vaderland, at a time when he resided in Holland. He adds—'I have lived to see it adopted by Lord Byron and by Mr. Southey, and the word is now common.' It is therefore an English word formed in imitation of a Dutch one.

FATHOM. M. E. fadom in Tyrwhitt's spelling; fadme would be better; the Six text edition has the readings fadme, fademe, fadmes, fajome. For the d sound, cf. M. E. fader, father. FAWN (2). In Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, l. 703, the Anglofeun means the young of the elephant.

FEALTY. The true O. F. form appears in the Anglo-F. fealte, fealty, Gaimar's Chron. 1. 3719; Year-books of Edw. I., vol. ii. pp.

301, 307. The adj. feal occurs in the Lib. Custumarum, p. 215. FEEE. Anglo-F. fee, feo, Year-books of Edw. I., i. 5; Stat. Realm, i. 34 (1275); pl. fees, Lib. Custum. 459. This appears to be merely the A. S. feok; M. E. fee, feo employed as a F. word. The O. F. forms are properly feu, fie, fieu (see Littre, s. v. fief), derived from O. H. G. fehu, fihu, cattle, property, which is cognate with A. S. feok: so that, either way, the result is much the same.

FELL (2). Cf. Swed. fall, a fell, fur-skin; Icel. fjall, a fell, skin.

FELL (3). Cf. Dan. fæl, hideous, grim, horrid. *FELLAH, a peasant, tiller of the soil. (Arab.) In Webster; pl. fellahin. – Arab. felláh (Devic), falláh (Rich. Dict. p. 1098), a farmer, villager, peasant. – Arab. root falah, to plough, till the ground. 3 F 2 FELLY. Cf. 'Cantus, felga;' Wright's Voc. i. 16, col. 1.

FELON, 1. 9. In saying that 'the Irish feall is clearly cognate with L. fallere,' it is as well to add, 'because an initial s has been lost in both cases.' Otherwise, this would not be the case, since an initial Irish f = Lat. u, as in fear = L. uir. A reference to the article Fail (to which I duly refer), will shew this. I think we may mark the word as  $(F_{.,-}Low Lat_{.,-}C_{.})$ .

FELT. Add: Swed. and Dan. filt.

FELUCCA. Dozy rejects the ordinary etymology of Span. feluca from Arab. fulk, and derives it rather from Arab. harrágah, harráqat, a kind of fire-ship; Rich. Dict. p. 560. Devic remarks that he considers this as not proven, and intimates that he prefers the usual etymology. See Dozy, Gloss. p. 265; Devic, Supp. to Littré FENCE. Cf. 'Fence, defence;' Palsgrave. And again, 'I fende (Lydgat), I defende, Ie defens;' id.

*FENUGREEK, a plant, cultivated for its seeds. (F., -L.) M. E. venecreke, Book of St. Albans, leaf c 4, back. - F. fenugrec, 'the herbe, or seed, fennigreeke;' Cot. - Lat. fanum Gracum, lit. 'Greek hay FERRÉT (1). M. E. feret; Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2; and Cath. Anglicum. Spelt fyret; Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 31; ed. Arber, p. 79, l. 39. 'Fyrret, a beest, furet; 'Palsgrave. FERRULE. Still earlier, we have E. vyroll, to explain F.

uirolle, in Palsgrave.

FERRY. Add: Dan. færge, to ferry; also a ferry. + Swed. färja, the same.

*FESS, a horizontal band, in heraldry. (F., -L.) Spelt fesse in Minsheu, and in Colgrave, s. v. face. The pl. feces occurs about A. D. 1500; see Queen Elizabeth's Academy, &c., ed. Furnivall, p. 98, l. 113. Florio (1598) translates Ital. fasce by 'bundles. . also fesses in armorie.'-O. F. fesse (Roquefort), spelt face in Cotgrave, and fasce in mod. F.-Lat. fascia, a girth; allied to fascis, a bundle; see Fascine.

FESTER. As to this difficult word, I would suggest that another point of resemblance between it and the A. S. fester- is that the e was formerly long. It is spelt feestryn in Prompt. Parv., and Palsgrave has: 'I festyr as a sore dothe, Ie apostume; Though this wounde be closed above, yet it feastreth byneth and is full of mater.' Next, as to sense, Palsgrave shews that it meant 'to gather' as an 'apostume,' or inward swelling. I think festered may be connected with the peculiar use of fostren, to kindle, glow, inflame, which arose out of the idea of fostering or cherishing a spark till it burst into flame. For this use, see P. Plowman, B. xvii. 207, 209; and again, in the Ancren Riwle, p. 206, 'he sparke .. lið and keccheð more fur, and fostreð hit forð, and waxeð from lesse to more vort al bet hus blasie,' i. e. the spark . . lies and catches more fire, and continually fosters it, and grows from less to more till all the house blaze. The metaphor of fostering presents no more difficulty than that of gathering, which is also used of a sore. Some suppose it possible that fester is allied to Icel. fasti, fire (Egilsson), Swed. dial. long e. corrupt, dialect of Aix fiesen, to begin to smell disagreeably; but the M. E. words allied to these are fyyst, 'stynk,' and fyistyn, 'Cacco, lirido' in Prompt. Parv.; and the mod. E. allied words are foist, filchew, and fizz.

FETCH. In the Errata to the former edition, I adopted Dr. Stratmann's view, that the M. E. fecchen, to fetch, from A. S. feccan, is quite distinct from M. E. feten, later English fet, from A. S. fetian; and I drew the conclusion that my article at p. 207 is wrong. No doubt we find a great difference of form; on the one hand we have M. E. fecchen, pt. i. fehte, spelt feight in Rob. of Brunne (Stratmann), fæhte in Layamon, 6460; A. S. feccan, Gen. xviii. 4, Luke xii. 20. On the other hand we have fet, to fetch (see Nares), though this form is commonly used as a pp., as in Shak. Hen. V. iii. 1. 18; M. E. fetten, feten, pt. t. fette, Chaucer, C. T. Group G. 548, pp. fet, Group B. 667; A. S. fetian, Grein, i. 283 (as already given at p. 207). The only question is, whether the A. S. feccan and fetian are different words, or mere variants of the same word. On this point see an article by J. Platt in Anglia, vi. 177, where the words are identified, fetian being taken as the older form whence feccan (as representing fechan , cc having the sound of ch in this instance). If this be so, my article is right; though I consider fetch as due to the pres. t. fecce rather than to the infin. feccan. ¶ Mätzner compares A. S. feccan with O. Fries. faka, to get ready; but this faka is parallel to A. S. facian, to wish to get, Ælfred, Orosius, b. iii. c. 11. § 10, from the sb. fac (stem fac-), a space of time, hence prob. opportunity (Grein, i. 267); and if fecan = fetian, this comparison fails. FFITD (1). Add: Dan. feide, a quarrel: feide, to war upon. + '7. to make war against; fejd, a feud (Tauchnitz, Eng.-

Swed. portion), formerly spelt fegd (Widegren). ¶ This fegd is quite distinct from Swed, feed, fatality, which is allied to E. fer. FEUD (2). Dele all following Low Lat. feudum, a fief. I en-

The tirely give up this notion of making the adj. feudalis the older word. That the Low Lat feudum is partly founded on O. H. G. fiks, felo, cattle, goods (cognate with E. fee), seems to be generally agreed upon. The difficulty is with the d, which some suppose to be intercalated ; see fio in Diez, 4th ed. p. 140.

FEVER. Corssen derives Lat. febris (as if for fer-bris*) from the same root as fer-uere, to glow. But see Vaniček.

FEY. Add: Swed. feg, cowardly, fegd, fatality, decree of fate; Dan. feig, cowardly.

*FEZ, a red Turkish cap, without a brim. (F., - Morocco.) Borrowed by us from F. fez, the same; the word is also Turkish. So called because made at Fez, in Morocco; see Devic, Supp. to Littré

FIEF; see remarks on Foud (2) above.

FILBERT. Wedgwood proposes filberde = fill the beard, i.e. husk; but the spelling fylberde in the Prompt. Parv. is a mere corruption of the earlier trisyllabic form in Gower (as cited). There is no more difficulty in 'Philibert's nut' than in the G. name meaning 'Lambert's nut.' FILE. There is good authority for A.S. feol; see Grein, i. 294. Lima, feol; 'Mone, Quellen, 367. FILIBUSTER. Not (Span., -E.), but (Span., -E., -Du.)

Wedgwood corrects this, and is certainly right. Whilst it is true that Span. filibole, filibole, is from E. fly-boar, it is also true that filibuster is another word altogether, and is merely the Span. pronunciation of E. freebooter, itself not a true E. word, but borrowed from Dutch. He refers us to Jal, Glossaire Nauique; see also Littré, s. v. flibustier, and Todd's Johnson, s. v. freebooter. Wedgwood says: 'Oexmelin, who was himself one of the buccaneers whose history he relates, expressly says that they gave themselves the name of flibustier from the English word flibuster, which signifies rover.' He then cites the passage, with a reference to vol. i. p. 22. By the word flibuster is certainly meant freebooter; the change of r to l being extremely common. Besides, the F. form was once fribustier (Todd and Littré). See further under Freebooter, p. 866. Monlau, in his Span. Etym. Dict., rightly derives filibote, flibote from E. flyboat, but filibustero from the Du. vrijbuiter (the E. freebooter being an intermediate form).

FIN. Stratmann gives five references for M. E. finne. ' Pynne of FINE. M. E. fin (with long i); written fyn, K. Alisaunder, 2657; in the passage cited, from P. Plowman, B. ii. 9, the form is finese. superlative.

FINIAL. Cf. 'every butterace fined [ended] with finials;' Will of Hen. VI; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 302. Anglo-F. finols, pl., Will of Earl of Essex (1361); id. p. 47.

FIR. The Swed. is fur or fura; furu is only used in composition, and in oblique cases (J. N. Grönland). Furu is the only form given FIRKIN. 'Kilderkyn and firken;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811,

p. 85.

*FIRM (2), a partnership. (Port., -L.) 'Firm, the name or names under which any house of trade is established;' Ash's Dict., 1775. This is the proper sense; it alludes to the signature of the house - Port. firma, 'a man's hand to a writing; a firm; ' Vieyra. - Port. firmar, to make firm; hence, to sign. - Port. firm, adj. firm. - L. firmus, firm; see Firm. ¶ If the word be not Port. it must be Span.; from Span. firma, a sign manual, signature, derived in the same way from firmar, vb., which is from firme, adj. Mahn is clearly wrong in citing 'Ital. firma,' as the Ital. spelling of the adj. is fermo, and the sb. ferma merely means an engagement.

FITCHEW. The nom. sing. is spelt fiches (perhaps by mis-take for ficheu) in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 4, back; the pl. is fecheus, id. leaf b 7, back. The pl. ficheux occurs A. D. 1438, in Filty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 110. The form ficheus answers to Walloon fichau, a polecat (Sigart). Hexham gives fine, visse, 'a weasel or polcat.'

FLAKE. Cf. Swed. dial. flag, a thin slice, also spelt flak (Rietz); Dan. sneeflage, snow-flake; sneeflokker, small flakes of snow.

FLAMINGO. See N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 326, 450, 478; iii. 35, 75, 110, 131; especially at the last reference. It is remarkable that, in Span. flamenco, the -enco is not a usual Span. suffix. The name seems to have arisen in Provence, where the bird was called flammant or flambant, i. e. flaming (from its colour). We even find flammans, i.e. flamingoes, in English; cf. An Eng. Garner, vii. 358 (1689): and in Urquhart's Rabelais. II. i., the bird is called a flaman (Davies). This Prov. flammant must have been confused with F. Flamand, a Fleming, a native of Flanders, because the Span. flamenco and Port. flamengo properly mean a Fleming. In Bluteau's Port. Dict. (1713), we find  $\oplus$  floating down; 'so ligt as een Flog' = as light as a feather. But Ramengo, a native of Flanders, and flamengo or flamenco, a flamingo, which he wrongly imagines to have come from Flanders, whereas it is abundant chiefly in Sicily, Spain, and the S. of France. See Mr. Picton's article in N. and Q. (as above). The word may be marked as (Span. or Port., - Prov., -L.). Flamingo occurs in E. ab. A.D. 1565, in An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 134; and again in 1582, id. 257.

FLARE. Note also Swed. flasa, to frolic, sport; answering to E. dial. to flare up.

FLATTER. It may be better to consider this as a Low G. form. = O. Du, faiteren, feiteren, 'to flatter or to sooth up one;' Hexham. Allied to Icel, fladra, to fawn upon. The O. F. flater is, of course, closely allied, but may likewise be considered as of Low G. origin. I still think that the bases FLAK and FLAT are equivalent; and that the forms cited from Swedish are to the point.

FLAVOUR. Rather  $(F_{..} - Low L_{..} - L_{.})$  than  $(Low L_{.} - L_{.})$ . The word is found in M. E.; the pl. flavorez (= flavorez), odours, occurs in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, A. 87. [It is quite a mistake to suppose that the u (between a and o) can possibly be a vowel here, as some seem to imagine.] - O. F. faveur, given by Roquefort with the sense of 'odour.' This settles the etymology from Low Lat. fawor, though more light is desired as to these O. F. and Low Lat. words. It is certain that Wyntoun (who rimes it with savour) uses the same word in a passage where the Scottish scribe (as usual) has absurdly used w for v. 'Of that rute the kynd flewoure [read flavourel, As flouris havand that sawoure [read savoure], He had, and held; Wynt. ix. 26. 107 (Jamieson, s. v. fleoure). In other and held; Wynt. ix. 26. 107 (Jamieson, s. v. fleoure). In other passages a confusion with M. E. floyre (Morte Arth. 772) may have taken place, this word being from O. F. fairer, as already noted; cf. Walloon fair, a bad smell (Sigart). But this confusion does not really affect the etymology, which in this case is determined by the form

*FLAWN, a kind of custard. (F., -O. H. G.) 'Fill ouen full of flawnes; Tusser, Husb. § 90. st. 5. M. E. flawn; Pastees and flawnes; Havelok, 644. – F. flan, O. F. flaon. Cotgrave gives flans, 'flawns, custards, egg. pies; also, round plates of metall; 'and flaons, 'round plates of metall.' [Cf. Span. flaon, flawn, plate of metal; Ital. fladone, 'a kind of flawne.' Florio; Low Lat. flado, flato, a flawn. ]-O. H. G. flado, a broad flat cake, flawn; M. H. G. vlade; G. fladen, a kind of pan-cake. β. So named from its flatness; Scheler cites Walloon flate, with the same sense as G. kuh-fladen, a piece of cow-dung; cf. O. Du. wlade, 'a flawne;' Hexham. 'As flat as a flawn' is a common old proverb (Hazlitt). The form flat has only been preserved in the Scandinavian tongues; the O. H. G. hado comes very near the Dan. flad, flat; the Low Lat. flato answers to the Icel. flatr, Swed. flat. The Lat. placenta, a cake, is named for a similar reason; see Placenta. (So Scheler, Diez, Weigand.)

FLEE. Dr. Stratmann remarks that flee may be the M. E. fleon; and the pt. t. fledde requires an infinitive fleden, for which we actually find flede, Myrc, Duties of a Parish Priest, l. 1374. But I suspect that this infinitive was coined from fledde, and that fledde was suggested by the Icel. Avoi, pt. t. of Avja, to fly. In any case, flee is but a variant of Ay. FILECE. It is spelt fliese (neut. accus.), with the various readings flys (= flys) and fleos, in Laws of Ine, § 69, in Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i 146, note 23.

FLEER. Under flina, Rietz gives flira as an equivalent form in Swed. dialects.

FLIRT. Note also the A.S. glosses: 'fraude, colludio, flearde, getwance;' Mone, Quellen, p. 362; 'deliramenta, gedofu, gefleard, id. p. 340; indruticans, luxurians, ticgende, broddiende, tolcedende, fleardiende;' id. p. 356. Also the cognate Swed. flord, ' deceit, artifice, vanity, frivolousness; fara med flärd, to use deceitful dealing (Tauchnitz Dict.). This is plain speaking as to what to flirt means.

FLOAT. The pres. pt. flotigende of the rare A.S. verb flotian, to float (as a ship), occurs in the Parker MS. of the A.S. Chronicle, anno 1031. The verb flotian, to float, and the sb. flota, a ship, are both derived from flot-en, pp. of the strong verb fleitan, already given FLOG. Certainly (L.); from flagellare. This appears at once by the fact that the Bremen Wörterbuch gives both flegel and flogger in the sense of 'flail;' and flegel, like E. flail, is merely from flagellum, not a word of Teut. origin. We may therefore confidently refer Low G. flogger and E. flog to the same source.

FLOUNCE (2). Cf. 'en la flounce du dit bacyn,' on the rim of the said basin, Will of Eleanor Bohun (1399); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 182.

the author of the Bremen Wörterbuch is quite wrong in deriving it from flegen, to fly; and, indeed, contradicts himself at the same moment by connecting it with F. Acc, which is plainly right. FLUSH (1). M.E. flock, a flood, or flow of blood, Alexander, ed. Stevenson, 2049. We there read that, in a battle, there was so much bloodshed that 'foles [foals, horses] ferd in the flosekes to the fetelakis.

FLUSH (3), level, even. I think this is certainly from Flush (1). We have, in Cotgrave, en flux, upon the increase; hence flush, adj. in its prime, in full vigour, as in Shak. Haml. iii. 3. 81; Ant. i. 4. 52. Hence it obtained the sense of 'good, right, correct,' as in Hazlitt, O. Plays, ii. 78, where Hypocrisy says he will so contrive that 'all should be flush that ever I did.' The senses seem to have been, in full flow, in one's prime, excellent, right; whence the senses of just, even, may have resulted.

FLUTE. M. E. floute, sb.; spelt flowte, floyte, Prompt. Parv.; Chaucer, Ho. of Fame, iii. 133. The Low Lat. flauta is merely Latinised from the French. The orig. word seems to have been the O. F. flauter, put for flatuer * = flatuare.

FLY. In the sense of carriage for hire, it seems to have been first applied to 'a nouvelle kind of four wheel vehicles drawn by a man and an assistant . . they are denominated flys, a name first given by a gentleman at the Pavilion [at Brighton] upon their first intro-duction in 1816;' Wright's Brighton Ambulator, 1818, quoted in Davies, Supp. Glossary. I think that the reason for the name was from the notion of its flying along, just as a fly-bont was named for the same reason; or it may have been simply short for fly-boat; the result being much the same. For a curious piece of evidence in this direction, see a picture of a public vehicle called 'The Velocitas, or Malton, Driffield and Hull fly-boat,' which was made in the shape of a boat with awnings above it, in Hone's Table-book, ii. 559. The description of it is dated Oct. 27, 1827. The remark (in the list of derivatives from fly) that filibuster is from fly-boat, is wrong; see note on Filibuster (p. 804 above).

FOAM. The A.S. fam answers better to M.H.G. feim, foam, given under the form veim in Wackernagel. Cf. also Russ piena, foam. The A.S. fim, Russ. piena, Skt. phena, seem to be due to a root  $\checkmark$  SPI; the L. spuma is explained by Fick, iii. 169, as standing for spoima. May not  $\checkmark$  SPI have been a by-form of ✓ SPU?

FOIL (2). Cf. Anglo-F. foilles, leaves, Stat. of the Realm, i. 219; le foile, the leaf of a book, Cursor Mundi, part 5, p. 5 (at the beginning).

*FOLD. The word fold, used as a sb., in the sense of sheep-fold, is not in any way allied to the verb to fold. It occurs as A. S. fald, in John x. I; but this is contracted from an older form falod; see Leo's Glossar. Perhaps falod meant 'protected by palings,' and is connected with Icel. fjöl (gen. fjalar), a thin board, plank. FOP. M. E. foppe, a foolish fellow, Prompt. Parv.; fop, Cov. Mysteries, p. 205; M. E. fobbe, Piers Plowman, C. iii. 193. *FOREJUDGE, to deprive a man of a thing by the judgment of a court. (F., -L.) Still in use as a law-term, and quite distinct from the hybrid word fore-judge, to judge beforehand. Better spelt forjudge; indeed, Blount's Nomolexicon (1691) has: 'forjudged the court, is when an officer of any court is banished or expelled the same.'-F. forjuger, 'to judge or condemn wrongfully, also to dissame. - F. forjuger, to judge or condemn wronguing, also to dis-inherite, deprive, dispossess of: Cotgrave. - O. F. for-, prefix, out, outside; and judge, to judge. The O. F. for- is short for fors = Lat. foris, outside. See Foreolose, and Judge. FORESTALL. The explanation given is incorrect, though the etymology is practically right, as the word is really compounded of fore and stall. There is no A. S. verb foresteallian, but there is an A. S. sb. forsteal or foresteal; and this is the real origin of the M. E. and E. verb. It is spelt forsteal, with the sense of 'obstruction,' in the Laws of Ethelred, v. § 31, and vi. § 38; see Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i. 312, 324. In the Laws of Hen. I (id. i. 586) we read that forestel est, si quis ex transverso incurrat, vel in via expectet et assalliat inimicum suum.' The etymology is from fore, before, and steall, a stall, also a placing, setting; and forsteall is lit. 'a placing of oneself in the way,' or the causing of an obstruction, or the crossing of a man's path. In Ælfric's Hom. ii 242, Thorpe trans-lates foresteall by 'a rescue;' it is more literally, opposition, an-tagonism. In an old Glossary, quoted in the Liber Albus, iii. 455, the M. E. forstal is said to mean 'estupure de chimin,' i. e. a stopping up of the way. From the sense of getting in another's way arose the commercial meaning of the word. See further in Schmidt,

A. S. Laws, Glossary, s. v. forsteal. FORGE. The old sense is curiously illustrated by the mention FLUE (2). The Low G. flog or flok means precisely flue or seie, a wrighte; Wiclif, Works, ed. Arnold, ii. 19.

FORMIDABLE. Prof. Postgate suggests the  $\checkmark$  GHAR, a  $\stackrel{o}{\leftrightarrow}$  the base FRI, to love, rejoice, please.  $\rightarrow$   $\checkmark$  PRI, to love; whence simpler form of  $\checkmark$  GHARS, to bristle; for which see Horror. also Free, Friend, q. v.  $\beta$ . The original sense of the root was This gives to  $\checkmark$  GHAR the sense 'to bristle,' as distinct from that of loving, pleasing; thence we pass to that of peace, rest quiet ✓GHAR, to grind. This is probable; and is well supported by the Lat.  $\hat{\sigma}$ , for Aer, a hedgehog, Gk.  $\chi h \rho$ . See Urchin, which ought, accordingly, to be referred to  $\checkmark$  GHAR, to bristle, not to the longer form GHARS. FORTNIGHT. The phrase occurs in the following: 'swa hwær swa bið sc móna fedwerlýne nikta eald,' whenever the moon is nwar swa bio se mona fouterisme initia cald, whenever the moon is a fortnight old (lit. old of fourteen nights, nikta being the gen. pl.); Screadunga, ed. Bouterwek, p. 25, l. 27; Popular Treatises on Science, ed. Wright, p. 6, l. 24. – W. M. (Bonn). FOUNT (1). After this word, insert 'Fount (2); see Font (2).' FRAMPOLD. Add that W. fromfol is compounded of W. from,

*FRANION, a gay idle companion. (F.,-L.) 'Franion, a gay idle fellow; see Heywood's Edw. IV. p. 45; Peele, i 207;' Halliwell. See further in Nares; also Dodsley's O. Plays, iv. 60, vi. 179. I adopt the suggestion in Nares, that it is equivalent to F. faineant, 'an idle, drowsie, lither, slothfull luske : . . , also, a lewd companion, loose fellow;' Cot. The agreement in sense is so minutely exact that I think we need look no further. Nares remarks that the r is lacking, but that is no great objection when we remember that the r is intrusive in g-r oom, bride-g-r-oom, part-r-idge, cart-r-idge. co-r-poral, vag-r-ant, and hoa-r-se. Perhaps our dra-matists were thinking of the infin. faire-meant. The form of the word certainly appears to be French. - F. fait meant, i. e. he does nothing; cf. vaurien = vaut rien, he is worth nothing. F. fait = Lat. facit, 3 pers. sing. of facere, to do; see Fact. F. neant (Cot.), O. F. nient, is der. from Lat. ne, not. and ent-em, acc. of ens, being, substance;

see No and Entity; (Scheler). Cf. Ital far niente, to do nothing. * FRANKALMOIGN, the name of the tenure by which most church lands are held. (F.; -O. H. G. and L., -Gk.) In Blackstone, Comment. b. ii. c. 4. Spelt frankalmoin in Blount's Nomo-lexicon; lit. 'free alms.' - F. franc, free; and almoine, Anglo-F. variant of O. F. almosne, mod. F. aumone, alms. See Frank and Almoner.

FRANKINCENSE. M. E. frank encens, Mandeville's Trav.

p. 120. 'Frankensence, franc encens;' Palsgiave. FRAY (1), an affray. Cf. Anglo F. effrai, a breach of the peace, Lib. Custumarum, p. 684; affrai de la pees, the same, Stat. Realm, i. 258, an. 1328; affrei, id. 185, an. 1322; &c. See remarks on Affray above, shewing that the etymology is from the Teut. fridu, peace. *FREEBOOTER, a rover, pirate. (Du.) Bacon, in his Life of Hen. VII., ed. Lumby, p. 129, l. 28, says that Perkin Warbeck's men were chiefly 'strangers born, and most of them base people and freebooters.' These strangers were mostly Flemings; see p. 112, 1. 11, &c. In a letter dated 1597, in the Sidney State Papers, ii. 78, is a mention of 'the freebutters of Flushenge;' Todd's Johnson. - Du. wrijbuiter, a freebooter - Du wrijbuiten, to rob, plunder.-Du. wrijbuit, plunder, lit, 'free booty.' The Du. wrij is cognate with E. free; and buit is allied to booty. See Free and Booty. Doublet, filibuster (see above).

FRICASSEE. Can F. fricasser be derived from Ital. fracassare, to break in pieces? See Fracas. FRIEZE (1). 'Thycke mantels of fryse they weare;' Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 82, l. 14 (A.D. 1528); spelt fress and fryse in Paston Letters, i. 83 (about A.D. 1449). Cf. 'a gowne of grene fress, 'occurring A.D. 1418; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 37, l. I. Pals-grave has: Fryse, roughe clothe, drap frise,' Sce note on Bris (below). BRINGE FRINGE. The O. F. fringe actually occurs, Dialoge, Gregoire lo Pape, p. 65 (Lacurne). The Wallachian form is frimble, also fringkie (Cihac). 'Freng, frenge;' Palsgrave.

*FRITH, an enclosure, forest, wood. (E.) It occurs as a placename in Chapel-le-Frink, Derbyshire, and is common in Kent in the names of woods; but is obsolescent. Drayton has: 'Both in the tufty frith and in the mossy fell,' Polyobion, song 17. M. E. frith, peace, Layamon, l. 2549; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 90; also in the sense of enclosed land, enclosure, park for hunting, forest, wood; thus in Layamon, 1432, where the older MS. speaks of hunting in the king's fritk [fride], the later MS. speaks of hunting in the king's park [parc]. See numerous examples in Mätzner, and cf. A. S. fridgeard, an enclosed space, lit. 'peace-yard' or 'safety-yard,' for which see Thorpe, Anc. Laws, ii. 298; also O. Swed. fridgiard, an which see Thorpe, Anc. Laws, in 296; also O. Swed. fragura, an enclosure for animals (lhre). - A. S. frið, peace; freodo, freodu, friðo, peace, security, asylum; Grein, i, 343, 347, 348. + Icel. friðr, peace, security, personal security: Dan. fred; Swed. fred, O. Swed. frid; Du. wrede, peace, quiet; G. friede, O. H. G. fridu, frida. All from a pair of common Teut. types FRITHU and FRITHA; All from a pair of common Teut. types FRITHU and FRITHA; r; formed with subst. suffix -THU or -THA from enjoyment, security; lastly to that of a place of security. The im-portant Teut. word frith implied also the safety of the individual and 'the king's peace;' to break it was to be guilty of an afroy, or violation of the peace; hence Affray and Fray. Hence also the M. H. G. bere-wil, that which preserves security, whence our Bel-fry. Borrowed forms are W. fridd. park, forest; Irish fritk, a wild mountainous place; Gael fritk, a forest for deer.

FRIZ. See Catholicon Anglicum, ed. Herrtage, p. 58, note 1, p. 142, note 2. The quotations there given render the derivation of friz from frieze (1) absolutely certain.

FRUITION. But the Lat. fruitio occurs in the works of St. Ierome ; see Lewis and Short. (A. L. M.)

FRY (2), spawn of fishes. But the F. frai (spelt fray in Cotgrave) is a verbal sb. from frayer = L. fricare; see Scheler, &c. Thus, notwithstanding the remarkable coincidence in form and sense between E. fry and F. frai, there is absolutely no etymological connection. It adds one more to the number of such instructive instances Still the E. fry is rather (F., - Scand.) than (Scand.). We find the Anglo-F. forms fry, frie, in the Lib. Albus, pp. 507, 508. FUEL. The Anglo F. form is fevaile, Lib. Albus, p. 337. FUGITIVE. M. E. fugitif, Mandeville's Trav. p. 66. FUMBLE. There is also Swed. fumla, to fumble, answering exactly to the E. word.

FUN. In N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 77, a correspondent endeavours to shew that fun was in use 'before 1724' by quoting two lines without any reference whatever! (The etymology there given from M. E. fonnen can hardly be right; as I have already said.) Its Celtic origin is further suggested by the expression 'sic fun ye never saw 'in what professes to be the original version of 'The Battle of Harlaw,' formerly sung in Aberdeenshire. For this ballad, see N. and Q. 3S. vii. 303, where it was first printed, in 1865.

FUND. Actually spelt fond; Eng. Garner, vi. 387; ab. 1677. FUNNEL. Prob. not (W), but (F., -L.). The word is older than the 16th cent. M. E. fonel, Prompt. Parv.; fonel, funell, Cursor Mundi, 3306; funelle, Cath. Angl. The explanation from W. fynel, Mundi, 3406 for the second seco given in Matzner, is, as Wedgwood says, very unsatisfactory. Fond probably represents an O. F. fonel * or fonil *, whence the Bret. Jouril, a funnel for pouring in liquids, is prob. merely borrowed. And this may well be from late Lat. fundibulum (Lewis and Short), which is merely a clipped form of the proper Lat. word, viz. infundibulum. Roquefort gives an O. F. enfouille, which he equates to Prov. enfounil and Lat. infundibulum; but it looks very much as if he has made a mistake, and that the right O. F. word was enfonille (with n, not u). I now think, with Wedgwood, that this F. origin is far more likely, notwithstanding the shortening of fundibulum to fouril* which is thus involved. This O. F. word for 'funnel,' as derived from fundere, was superseded in F. by the word which we now spell tunnel. The change of sense from 'pipe to pour in by' to 'flue' or chimney is just what we should expect, and occurs again in the very case of Tunnel, q. v. (p. 668). As to W. ffynel, it is merely the M. E. word borrowed.

FUR. Cf. Anglo-F. forure, furrure, fur trimmings, Lib. Albus, pp. 225, 279. This corresponds to M. E. furrur, fur trimmings (Fifty Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 54, l. 6), and to F. fourrure, 'fur, furring, skins to fur with,' Cot.; and to Low Lat. fodratura, fur. Cf. Low Lat. foderatus, furred, fodera, fur (A.D. 1295), the latter being a mere Latinised form from the Low German. Besides the Icel. foor, we have O. Du. voeder, (1) fodder, (2) 'furre, or lyning,' Hexham. Cotgrave explains fourre by 'furred, sheathed, cased.' Thus the etymology cannot well be doubted. We even find Anglo-FURBISH. The pp. fourboskid (better fourbishid) occurs as early as in Wyclif, Works, ed. Arnold, i. 224, l. 4.

FURNISH. The Anglo-F. form furmir, to perform, occurs in the Life of Edw. Confessor, ed. Luard, 1. 1443.

FURROW. Add: Dan. fure, a furrow, also as verb, to furrow. +Swed. fara, the same.

FURZE. The comparison with Gael preas is probably wrong.

FUSS. Cf. Swed. dial. fus, eager, Swed. framfusig, pert, saucy. The Swed. verb fuska, to bungle, Dan. fuske, to bungle at, seems to belong here. FUTTOCKS. Also spelt foot-kooks in Bailey, ed. 1745.

right angles, always in the same direction. (E.) Also called a re-bated cross. See Fairholt, Dict. of Terms in Art; and Boutell's Heraldry. Supposed to be (as is probable) a corruption of A. S. fier-fote, variant of fyder-fote, four-footed, in allusion to its shape. The change from r to l is common. Cf. Swed. fyrfotad, four-footed. The A. S. fyder., i. e. 'four,' is only found in compounds; the usual form is feiwer; cf. Goth. fidwor. See Four and Foot.

GAD (2). Wedgwood explains this by 'to run hither and thither without persistent aim, like cattle terrified by the hum of the gadfy.' He cites the Ital. assillo, 'a sharpe goade,' Florio; and assillare, 'to bite with a horseflie; also to leap and skip furiously, as oxen do, when they are stung and bitten with flies.' If this be so, then gad, v. is from gad, sb., just as the Icel. gadda is from gaddr; only it was formed in England. It makes very little difference to the etymology. See quotations in Richardson and Johnson. GAFF. M. E. gaffe, a hook, abt. A. D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii.

*GALINGALE, the pungent root of a plant. (F., - Span., -Arab.) M. E. galingale, Chaucer, C. T. 383. - O. F. galingal*, not authorised, but it must have occurred, as the form garingal is com-mon, and the usual later F. form is galangue, as in Cotgrave. – Span. galanga, the same. – Arab. khalanján, galingale; Rich. Dict. p. 625. Said to be of Pers. origin. See Devic, Supp. to Littré; Marco Polo, ed Vale is est. ed. Yule, ii. 181.

GALLANT, l. 9. The form of the base of Goth. gailjan is rather GIL GALLIAS. Not (F.), but (F., - Ital.).

*GALORE, abundantly, in plenty. (C.) Also spelt gelore, gilore in Jamieson, and golore in Todd's Johnson. 'Galloor, plenty, North;' Grose (1790). - Irish goleor, sufficiently; where go is a particle which, when prefixed to an adjective, renders it an adverb, and leor, adj., means sufficient; Gael. gu leor, or gu leoir, which is precisely the same. Cf. Irish lia, more, allied to L. plus. *GALT, also GAULT, a series of beds of clay and marl.

(Scand.) A modern geological term. Prov. E. galt, clay, brick-earth, Suffolk (Halliwell). [Of Scand. origin; the spelling gault is phonetic.] – Norweg. gald, hard ground, a place where the ground is trampled hard by frequent treading, also a place where snow is trodden hard; Icel. gald, hard snow, also spelt galdr, gaddr. ¶ In no way allied to Icel. gaddr (for gasdr*), a goad. GAMMON (1). M. E. gambon, Book of St. Albans. leaf f 2, back. This verifies the etymology.

GAMUT. Strictly, the word is (Hybrid; F., -L., -Gk., - Phoenician; and L.) The Greek  $\gamma \dot{\alpha} \mu \mu \alpha$  stands for  $\gamma \dot{\alpha} \mu \lambda \alpha$  (the pronunciation in the Mishna, see Fürst); and is from the Phœnician word corresponding to Heb. gámál, a camel. Cf. Heb. gimel, the name of the third Heb. letter. See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, iii. 1797.-A. L. M. Cf. 'gammouthe, gamme;' Palsgrave. 'Game, f. gamut;' Cotgrave.

*GANG (2), to go. (Scand ) In Barbour's Bruce, ii. 276, iv. 193,

GAR (2), to go, to go; see Go. GAR (2). Vigfusson treats the Icel. görr, adj. skilled, ready made, dressed, which he gives at p. 225, col. 2, § F, as all one with görr, the pp. of göra. In other Teut. languages they are distinct, as shewn by Fick, iii. 102. The connection with Yare and Gear is, in any case, certain.

GARDEN. Section y. In the passage referred to, Brachet speaks only of the Latin t, not of the O. H. G. t. But see also § 27, where he explains that the O. H. G. consonants were subject to the same laws as the Latin consonants. The Prov. form giard-ina suggests that the suffix may be considered as Romance (see Diez).

GARNET. Cf. Anglo-F. gernet, a little grain of wheat, Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, l. 453. Evidently for grenet +, and a derivative of Lat. granum. GARTER. Anglo-F. garter, Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363. Walloon gartier (Sigart). GAS. The original passage in which this word first occurs is cited in N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 111. 'Gas et Blas nova quidem sunt nomina a me introducta eo quod illorum cognitio veteribus fuit ignota; attamen inter initia physica Gas et Blas necessarium locum obtinent;' Van Helmont, Ortus Medicinæ, Amsterdam, 1648, p. 73. GATE. This article is not sufficiently explicit. There are really two words of this form, close related; one being E., the other of Scand. origin. They should be thus distinguished. A. Mod. E. gate, a door, opening, M. E. jate, yate, A. S. geat, cognate with Icel. gat, Du. gat; from the common Teut. type GATA, a neuter noun. B. Mod. E. gate. chiefly in the North, a way, path, street; Icel. gata, Swed. gata, Dan. gade, cognate with Goth. gatwo, G. gasse, a way, street; from the common Teut. type GATWAN, a feminine noun.

*FYLFOT, a peculiarly formed cross, each arm being bent at of The distinction appears in the Lowl. Scotch 'gang yer gate, and steek the yett ahint ye.' (Suggested by A. L. Mayhew; I had already made the distinction, but it is worth while to make it still clearer.)

GAUGE. We find gaugez, pp. pl, gauged, and gaugeour, a gauger, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 331, an. 1353. The O. F. gauger, to gauge, precisely answers to a Low Lat. form jalagiare*, from the sb. jalagium. Corresponding to F. jale or gale (see Gallon) is the Low Lat. galum or galus, a gallon, measure of wine.

GAUNT. I explain the disputed word arm-gaunt to mean 'slender-armed,' the arm being the technical name for the upper part of a horse's fore-leg. It is an epithet implying praise, not depreciation. \*GAUNTLET (2). In the phr. 'to run the gauntlet,' we have a corruption of an older gantlope. It appears as run the gantlope in Bailey (1735), Kersey (1715), Philips (1706), and Blount (1674). Bailey correctly defines it as ' to run through a company of soldiers, standing on each side, making a lane, with each a switch in his hand to scourge the criminal.' Widegren's Swed. Dict. (1788) gives 'gatulopp, s. gantelope, gantlet; lopa gatulopp, to run the gantelope." GAVELKIND. Not (C.), but (E.) The likeness of the Irish word cited (which should be spelt gabal-cined) to the E. gavelkind appears to be accidental. For some history of it, see Elton's Tenures of Kent (1867); and compare the term gafol-land, in Kemble, Saxons in England (1849), i. 320; Codex Diplomaticus, i. p. lxi. We find the form gavelkynde in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 218, 223, before A. D. 1327; and Elton cites a far older form gauelkende from an ancient grant of A. D. 1043, which exhibits the Kentish peculiarity of putting kende for kynde. (Cf. Kentish pet, a pit; A.S. pyt.) The correspond-ing A.S. form would be gafol-cynd, i.e. 'condition of tribute;' compounded of gafol, tribute, and cynd, sort, kind, condition. Both of these are common words, and gafol enters into several compounds, such as gafol-land, land let on rent, gafol-penig, tribute-penny, &c. As to A.S. cynd, see Kind (2). B. I have so far considered gafol as an E. word; but it is doubtful whether the word is Teutonic. The G. gaffel, tribute, is not an old word; and this, as well as A. S. gafol, cannot be separated from the Low Lat. gabulum, gablum, tribute, whence F. gabelle, Ital. and Port. gabella, Span. and Prov. gabela, tribute, tax. Either these are all derivatives from the pt. t. of the Tentonic verb to give (as seen in Goth. gaf, gave), or we must look elsewhere. Devic, following Dozy, says that the Ital. form was sometimes written cabella and caballa, and Ducange gives the same forms in his Dict. of Low Latin. Hence g is thought to be a mere substitution for an older  $\epsilon$ ; which suggests a derivation from a Semitic source, viz. Arab. gabala, said by Devic to mean 'impost' or 'tax,' though Richardson (Dict. p. 1112) only gives the senses 'contract, deed, written agreement, bail, bond.' The antiquity of the term in English renders an Arab. derivation rather difficult. See Devic, Supp. to Littré; Diez, 4th ed. p. 720. ¶ In any case, the derivation from the Celtic must be given up, as the technical Irish term gabal cined has nothing to do with 'rent,' but meant originally 'the branch (gabal) of a sept or tribe (cined), then the share of land falling to such a branch.' (Kindly communicated by Dr. W. K. Sullivan.)

GENET. M. E. genete, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 31, ed. Arber, p. 79, l. 29. The fur of the genet was known in England as early as 1418: see Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 36, note 7.

GERM. Vaniček refers it to VKAR, to make, which seems This allies it to L. creare, &c. better.

 HIS antes it to L. creare, etc.,
 GERMANDER, a plant. (F., - Ital., -L., -Gk.) In Bacon,

 F. germandrée, germander (Cotgrave). - Ital. calamandrea, germander (by the common change from l to r). A corrupt form of L. chamædrys, wall germander. Pliny (White). - Gk. χαμαίδρυς, germander, lit. ground tree, or low-growing tree - Gk. xaµal, on the ground;  $\delta p v_s$ , tree. See Chamoleon and Tree. GHASTLY. The ref. to Grein (i. 374) is wrong; the word in Grein is gæstlic, lit. 'guest-like,' hence, hospitable, &c. The word ghastly does not appear in A.S.; if it did, it would be gæstlic (which occurs only in the sense of ghostly). It is from gastan, to vex, Grein, i. 374, of which the orig. sense was prob. to terrify, as in M.E. gasten, to scare, which see in Stratmann. The rest of the article is,

I think, correct, since A.S. gást- represents a Teut, stem gaist-. GHOST. Add: Swed. gast, evil spirit, ghost; gastar skola där springa, 'satyrs shall dance there,' Isaiah xiii 21 (Widegren). The form of the root is Teut. GIS = Aryan GHIS, but the sense of the root is unknown; it is uncertain whether we may connect it with Goth. us-gais-jan, to terrify, from a root of the same form (Fick, iii.

107), whence E. ghastly, aghast. GIAOUR. Add: another view is that the word is of Semitic origin. Thus Zenker, in his Dictionnaire Turc Arabe-Persan, gives Turk. kofir, an infidel, adding 'vulgarly jawr.' It would thus appear that Giaour is a Turkish corruption of the Arab. káfir, whence the OGOSPEL. There is an earlier instance of the alteration of zod-Turk. káfir is plainly borrowed. Rich. Arab. Dict. has káfir, denying God, an infidel, pagan, impious wretch. Cf. Arab. kafr, being impious, from the root kafara, to hide, conceal; Rich. Dict. pp. 1163, GIBBERISH. Spelt gibridge. Dodsley's O. Plays, ed. Hazlitt, viii. 75: Cotgrave, s. v. bagois. We may explain gibber as a frequentative of gibe, q.v. It makes but little difference. GIBBET. It seems reasonable to connect this word with Swed.

dial. gippa, to jerk; for which see Jib (2). GIFT. Add: cf. Dan. gifte, to give away in marriage, giftes, to be married, tilgift, something given in addition; Swed. tillgift, pardon, hemgift, a dower.

GIN (3). Perhaps (Du., -F., -L.) I think it probable that the word geneva was not taken directly from F. genevre, but from Du. jenever, meaning both 'juniper' and 'gin;' see Sewel. This Du. jenever is, however, merely borrowed from F., so that it comes to much the same thing. Cf. Theriaque des Alemans, the juice of gineper berries extracted according unto art;' Cotgrave. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology.

GINGER. The earliest forms are A.S. gingiber, gingifer, borrowed directly from Latin; see Gloss. to A.S. Leechdoms, vol. iii.

GIRAFFE. Not (F., - Span., - Arab., - Egyptian), but (F., -Span., - Arab.) The Egyptian origin is suggested by Mahn, who derives it from Egyptian soraphe, which he explains by 'long neck.' Dr. Wright tells me there is no foundation for this supposition.

GIRD (1). Add: Swed. gjorda, to gird. GIRD (1). Add: Swed. gjorda, to gird. GIRDH. Add: Swed. gjord, a girth. *GIADEN, GLADDEN, a plant, Iris pseudacorus. (L.) doms, Gloss. to vol. ii. Englished from Lat. gladiolus, 'a sword-Lewis and Short. - Lat. gladius, a sword; see Gladiator. lily;' *GLAMOUR. See Gramarye below.

GLEAN. Cf. the A. S. gloss: 'manipulos, gilman;' Mone, Quellen, p. 379. See also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 158, note 4. *GLEEK (1), a scoff, a jest. (Scand.) It means a 'scoff' in Shak. 1 Hen. VI. iii. 2. 123; 'a glance of the eye' in Beaum. and Platcher Maid in the Mill is a Sea aromples in Nerse. It is the Fletcher, Maid in the Mill, ii. 2. See examples in Nares. It is the same as Lowl. Sc. glaik, a glance of the eye, a deception, a trick, cheat, toy; cf. glaik, verb, to trifle with. I suppose it to be merely the same word as Lowl. Sc. laik, a stake at play, play of swords, North E. lake, a play, a game, with the prefix ge, shortened to g. This prefix is rare in Scand., but occurs in O. Icel. glikr, like, now likr, where the use of g- for ge- is obvious. - Icel. leikr, a game, play, sport. - Icel. leika, strong verb, to play, sport, delude, put a trick upon, bewitch.+Swed. leka, to sport, play.+Dan. lege, to play.+ A.S. gelácan, pt. t. geléc, to put a trick upon, delude, whence gelác, sb. play. The pt. t. geléc, deluded, occurs in Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. iii. ch. 7. § 4. *GLEEEK (2), a game at cards. (F., -G.) So in Ben Jonson, Alchem. v. 2 (Subtle); it is said that Catharine of Arragon 'played at gleeke; 'Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, sect. liv; vol. iii. p. 258, note c, ed. 1840. See Nares. It should rather have been spelt glik, but was confused with the word above; see the pun in Greene's Tu Quoque (Nares). - O. F. glic, an old F. game at cards (mentioned in Rabelais, bk. i. c. 22), Roquefort; 'selon Villon et Coquillard, il signifie bonheur, hazard; 'Nares. - G. glück, luck; see Luck. GLINT. Cf. GLOW. Though the A.S. glowan is rare, we find examples of it. The pres. part. glówende occurs in Ælfric's Homilies, i. 424, last line, and in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 216, l. 1. It is not a weak verb, as is supposed; for I have found the pt. t. gleow in Ælfric's Lives of Saints, vii. 240. See my edition, p. 184. GLOZE. Not  $(F_{..}-L_{.})$ , but  $(F_{..}-L_{.},-Gk_{.})$ . GNARL. The A.S. verb is rather gnyrian than gnyrran; the pres. part. gnyrende occurs, to translate Lat. stridentes; A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 210, l. 12. But the word is not quite certain ; Mr. Cockayne adds the note, ' I read grinende."

GOAL, I. 10. It may be better to leave out the reference to prov. E. wallop, which appears to be, etymologically, much the same as gallop; see Gallop. GOOSEBERRY. 'Vua orispa is also called Grossularia, in english a Groser bushe, a Goosebery bush;' W. Turner, Names of Her<sup>1</sup> '88 (E. D. S.). Cf. 'Ramni, grosiler,' in Wright's V 'rosiler is an O. F. form. 'Goseberry, grossille; willing.' Balerance. seillier ; ' Palsgrave.

spell into geidspell than the one given from the Ormulum. In a Voca-bulary of the 11th century, we find: 'Euvangelium (sic), id est. bonum nuntium, god-spel,' the accent being unmarked; Wright's Voc. i. 75. Doubtless, this reasonable alteration is very old, but Grein's argument remains sound, viz. that we must account for the Icel. and Ö. H. G. forms.

GRAIL (3). Another view is that Spenser meant grail to represent F. gréle, O. F. gresle, hail. This would appear more clearly if we could find an example of O. F. gresle used to mean 'pebble.' which appears to be the lit, signification. For F. grile, sb., O.F. greste, is supposed to be a dimin. of F. grest, sand-stone (cf. F. gre: u, sleet). – G. gries, cognate with E. Grit, q. v. This makes Spenser's grail to have the lit. sense of 'fine grit;' which is precisely the Dor. engrailed, which see above. sense required.

*GRAMARYE, majc. (F., - L., -Gk.) Used by Scott, Lay of the Last Minstrel, iii. 11, vi. 17; who took it from King Estmere' in Percy's Reliques, where it occurs in a passage the genuine ness of which is very doubtful ; see Percy Folio MS., ii. 604. 1. 144, ii. 6c6, l. 274. The same word as M. E. gramery, gramory, skill in grammar, or (jestingly) skill in magic. 'Cowthe ye by youre gramery reche us a drynk, I should be more mery;' Towneley Myst, p. 90. 'I se thou can of gramory and som what of arte;' id. p. 311. - O. F. gramaire, grammar; see Grammar. Gr I desire here to record my opinion, that the word glamour, magic, also used by Scott in the same poem (iii. 9), and taken by him from the expression 'They coost the glamer o'er her' in Johnny Faa (printed in Ritson's Sc. Poems, ii. 176), is nothing but another form of gramere, i. e. grammar. The note in Vigfusson's Dict. asserting the identity of glamour with Icel. glámr, the moon, I believe to be a mere delusion, due to a clutching at an 'etymology.' The Icel. glumr - A. S. glam = E. gleam; just as Icel. sad = A. S. sad = E. sead. The -r in glam-r is no true syllable, but merely a case-ending. I see that Littré (s.v. grimoire) agrees with me as to glamowr. GRAPPLE. Not (F.), but (F., -M. H. G.). GRAZE (1). I strongly suspect that the use of graze, in the sense 'to touch slightly in passing,' actually arose from graze, the verb formed from the sb. grass. I think that graze may have taken the sense 'to touch the grass slightly' from the rebounding of shot when touching the surface of grassy ground, and slightly tearing it up. In Hen. V. iv. 3. 105, the 'bullet's grazing' seems to mean the bullet's rebound from the earth. Confusion with grate and raze may have dimmed its true origin.

*GREENGAGE, a kind of plum. This stands for green Gage. where Gage is a personal name. It is the French plum called a grosse Reine Claude, and is written as Green Gage in P. Miller, Gardener's Dictionary, 7th ed. 1759, s.v. Prunus. There is also a blue Gage and a purple Gage. 'Plum; of the many sorts, the follow-ing are good: Green and blue gage, Fotheringham, &c.; C. Marshall, Introd. to Gardening, 1796, p. 3;0. In R. Hogg's Fruit Manual, 4th ed. 1875, it is said to have been introduced 'at the beginning of the last century, by Sir T. Gage, of Hengrave Hall, near Bory, who procured it from his brother, the Rev. John Gage, a Roman Catholic priest then resident in Paris.' The following account is more explicit, and gives the name as Sir William Gage. In Hortus Collinsonianus, p. 60, are some Memoranda by Mr. Collinson, written 1759-1765, where is the following entry. 'On Plums. Mem. I was on a visit to Sir William Gage, at Hengrave, near Bury: he was then near 70. He told me that he first brought over, from France, the Grosse Reise Claude, and introduced it into England; and in compliment to him the Plum was called the Green Gage; this was about the year 1725. β. It must be added, that Mr. Hogg shews (J. A. H. Murray.) that there is reason for supposing that this plum was known in England at least a century earlier than the above date, but was then called the Verdoch, from the Ital. verdochia, obviously derived from verde (L. uiridis), green. But this does not affect the etymology of the present name.

GRIDDLE. The spelling gredyron, for gridiron, occurs in Bury

Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 153 (A.D. 1559). Palsgrave has gyrdiron. GRIG. The etymology is very doubtful. If it be derived from a Scand. strong verb, signifying 'to creep,' as I suppose, it must be distinguished from cricket, and the reference to Cricket (1) must be omitted, as will appear by reference to that article. The weakening of k to g occurs in some instances, as in grant, a derivative of credere; grapnel, due to M. H. G. krapfe, grate (1) from Lat. crata, for crates, golf from kolf, gondola from korov, goblin from koßakos, gall (2) from callus, gobion from cause. GRIMALKIN. Malkin is certainly a dimin. of Maud, as ex-plained in my note to Piers Plowman, C. ii. 181. Malkyne, or Mawt, propyr name, Molt, Mawde, Matildis, Matilda ;' Prompt. Parv. Thus the word is of O. H. G. origin; from O. H. G. makt-hilt, used as a proper name. Here makt means 'might,' cognate with E. might; " GURNARD. Cf. crooner, a gurnard, so called because it croons and hilt means 'battle,' cognate with A.S. hild, battle. GRISLY. There is a difficulty about the A.S. forms; there are forms which point to a base GRUS, viz. begrorene, gryre, gryrelic. whilst others point to a base GRIS, viz. ágrísan. My supposition that ágrísan is put for ágrýsan, is hardly tenable; for we find the pt. t. agros in Rob. of Glouc. p. 549, l. 13, and agras in Layamon, l. 11976; see Stratmann, s. v. agrisen. Other languages support the theory that there must have been two forms of the base. 1. From the base GRUS we have G. graus, horror, grausen, to cause to shudder, M. H. G. grus, horror, &c. ; also, from a shorter base GRU, we have G. grauen, M. H. G. gruen, impers. verb, to shudder, graulich, gräulick, hideous, Dan. gru, horror, terror; see Gruesome. 2. Again, from the base GRIS we may deduce O. Du. grijselick, horrible (Hexham), O. II. G. grisenlick (Graff, iv. 301); and cf. Swed. gräslig, Dan. græsselig, hideous, horrible. Kichthofen gives O. Fries. grislik in his Dictionary, but gryslik in his text. There has evidently been considerable confusion of the forms.

GROCER. Spelt grosser, Stat. of the Realm, i. 379, an. 1363;

GROMWELL, a plant. (F.,-L.) The letter w is a modern insertion; Cotgrave, s. v. gremil, gives gromill, grummell; Palsgrave has gromell; the Prompt. Parv. has gromaly or gromely sede; grummel occurs in the 14th century, in Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 52, l. 1; and the Cath. Angl. has both grumelle and gromelle. The gromwell or Lithospermum is remarkable for its hard, stony seeds: I therefore propose to derive M. E. gromel or grumel from O. F. grumel, mod. F. grumeau, a clot. Roquefort gives O. F. grumel, 'pelote, peloton;' dimin. of grume, used to mean all kinds of grain. Cotgrave also gives grum as a Languedoc word synonymous with F. grain, grain. - Lat. grumulus, a little hillock; dimin. of grumus, a hillock. It would seem that the Lat. grumus came to mean a mere clot of earth. Cf. Span. grumillo, a small clot, a curd; ¶ It is usual to derive gromwell from F. from grumo, a clot. gremi (also gremi in Cotgrave), which is the F, name for the plant. But such a vowel-change is quite inexplicable, and it is supposed that grenil is an older form than grénil, being perhaps a derivative from Lat. granum, a grain. The derivation of the E. word from grume, often used as synonymous with grain, seems to satisfy the conditions. We may note that gromwell is also called in E. gray millet or (in Cotgrave) graymill, which is merely the F. gremil ingeniously made partly significant, and was clearly suggested by the fact that gromwell was sometimes called milium solis as well as granum solis; see Cath. Anglicum.

GROWL. 'I wolde .. that ther sholde thenne suche wrake (vengeance) be taken therof, that ther snoide theme suche wrake [vengeance] be taken therof, that hym myght growle that euer he sawe hym; 'Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 30, ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 37. GRUNT. The A.S. verb is, rather, grunian. We find 'sus grunnit, swin grunað;' Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 129, l. 3. GUARANTEE. Spelt garauntye, Langtoft's Chron. i. 218; garauntie, Stat. of the Realm, i. 37, an. 1275; warrantie, Year-books of Edw. I. ii. 331.

GUAVA. Spelt guayva in 1593; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 532; in an account of Drake's expedition to Panama, &c. It is also men-tioned in 1689; id. vii. 367. Minsheu's Span. Dict. (1623) has Guaiábos, a kinde of fruit in the Indies.

*GUILDER, a Dutch coin. (Du., -G.) In Shak. Com. Errors, i. 1. 8; iv. 1. 4. A corrupt form of Du. gulden, a guilder, 'a piece of ao stivers' (Sewel). Hexham has Carolus guiden, 'a Charles gilder;' Philippus guiden, 'a Philip's gilder;' the former evidently refers to Charles V., and the name of the coin is borrowed from German. - G. gulden, gülden, a florin; as the name implies, the coin was at first of gold, though afterwards made of silver. The M.H.G. name was guldin, or guldin pfenninc, the golden penny (Lat. aureus denarius). Formed, with vowel-change of o to u, and adj. suffix -in, from G. gold, gold, cognate with E. Gold. See Weigand. Cf. Goth. gultheins, golden, from gulth, gold. GULLES. Spek goules in Anglo-F., in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 430.

Cf. gule, throat, mouth, in Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, l. 875.

GULF. Rather (F., - Ital., - Gk.) 'This word, as Niebuhr teaches, passed into the Italian from the Greek towns in the South of Italy, where the Hellenic language was not extinguished till the third or even the righth century after Christ; 'Cockayne, Spoon and Sparrow, p. 65. Niebuhr says, 'Traces of Greek words still exist in the Neapolitan dialect. The Italian word golf (sic) is evidently formed from  $\kappa\delta\lambda\pi\sigmas$ : the bay of Naples is specially called the gulf; but the ancients also called it sparip;' Lectures on Ethnography, tr. by L. Schmitz, ii. 140.

GUTTER. Cf. Anglo-F. gutteres, pl., in Lib. Albus, p. 288. GUM (2). The word is of Egyptian origin; the Coptic form of GUM (2). The word is of Egyptian origin; the Coptic form of hanga, G. hangen, are strong, but intransitive. I have given the the word is komē (whence Gk. κόμμι); see Peyron, Coptic Dict. p. 67. general Teutonic use correctly; the A.S. use is exceptional.

or murmurs (Jamieson). See Palmer's Folk-Etymology.

GUT. The M. E. gut or gutte, gut, is not quite the same word as M. E. gote, a water-channel, which latter is cognate with G. gosse, a kennel, sewer. But they are closely related; we may derive the former from the base of gut-on, pt. pl. of geotan, to pour, and the latter from the base of got-en, pp. of the same.

GYPBY. The Gk. Alyvaroe is not der. from the old Egyptian language, but is prob. of Semitic origin. The native name of Egypt was Chemi (the Ham of the Bible). Afyurros is probably a Gk form of the Phœnician name I-KAFT, 'the isle or coast of Kaft.' Kaft is the native name of Phœnicia, and means 'a palm-tree;' cf. Phœnicia and poivit, a palm.—A. L. M. 'A company of lewde personnes within this realme, calling themselves Gipcyans,' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 101 (1537). 'Wandering vagabonds calling and naming themselues Egiptions:' Harman's Caveat, p. 23 (1567).

HABERDASHER. The word occurs early in the 14th century. Some ill-made caps were found 'super diversos haberdasshers et capellarios;' Liber Memorandorum, temp. Edw. II., pr. in Liber Albus, ed. Riley, iii. 433. HACK (1). The pt. t. to haccode, from an infin. to haccian, Cambridge. 1831), p. 36, l. 22. (T. N. Toller.)

*HAGGIS, a dish commonly made in a sheep's maw, of the minced lungs, heart, and liver of the same animal. (E.; with F. suffix.) M. E. hagas, hageys, hakkys, Prompt. Parv. Also spelt haggas, hagges, hakeys; see notes to Prompt. Parv., and to the Catholicon Anglicum, p. 169; also the account in Jamieson. It answers to the F. hachis, 'a hachee, a sliced gallimaufry, or minced meat;' Cot. And it appears to have been formed, in imitation of this F, sb., directly from the E. hack, to cut small, of which a common Lowland Sc. form is hag. appearing also in the E. frequentative haggle; see Haggle (1). And see Hash. Cf. also Du. haksel, minced meat, and Low G. haks un plüks, a kind of hash or mince. ¶ The Gael. taigeis, a haggis, is merely borrowed from English; see note on Hogshead, p. 811. HALE (2), HAUL. Not (E.), but (F., - Scand.). The vowel shews that it must have been borrowed from F. haler, to hale or haul. This F. word was borrowed, in its turn, from Scandinavian; cf. Swed. hala, Dan. hale, also O. H. G. halón, as already given. It makes no difference in the ultimate result, or in the root, the A.S. holian being cognate with the Scand and G. words. The F. haler occurs in the 12th cent. as a nautical word (Littré).

HALIBUT. It is suggested that the M.E. butte is rather 'flounder' than 'plaice ;' cf. G. butte, a flounder. The Tauchnitz Du. Dict. gives Du. bot, 'a flounder, plaice.' The fact is simply that fishnames, like plant-names, are in a state of great confusion.

*HALT (2), as sb., a sudden stop; as a verb, to stop quickly at the word of command. (Ital., -G.) 'And in their march soon made a halt;' Sir W. Davenant, The Dream, st. 19. A military term. Dr. Murray says it first came in as an Ital. term, without initial h; and Richardson quotes the form alt from Milton, P. L. vi. 532, where mod. editions have halt. - Ital. alto; as in fare alto, to make a halt, to stop. - G. halt, halt! lit. hold! from halten, to hold. check, cognate with E. Hold (1), q.v. The word has passed, from G., into several languages.

HAM. Add: Icel. kom, the ham or haunch of a horse + Swed. dial. ham, hind part of the knee. + Du. ham, the ham.

HAMLET. Anglo-F. hamelet, Year-books of Edw. I. i. 25, 185; also hamel, Stat. of the Realm, i. 327, an. 1352.

HAMMER-CLOTH. Orig. spelt with only one m. 'Hamer-clothes, with our armes and badges of our colours and all other things apperteinynge unto the said wagon;' Archæologia, xvi. 91 (Document of the time of Q. Mary). See N. and Q. 2 S. xi. 66. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, corrects ' coach' to ' couch' in my quotation from Sewel. But in the copy used by me (ed. 1754, p 138) the word is 'coach;' and so it is in Hexham. Sewel explains koets both by 'coach' and by 'couch;' Hexham. Sewer explains worrs both by 'coach' and by 'bed;' and gives the verb koerse, 'to ride in a coach or wagon, where the sense cannot be doubted. Sewel may be wrong, but my quotation is accurate, as may be verified by any who may please to look. I may note that hammer- cannot possibly be from Icel. ham-r, where the -r is merely a case-sign, and nothing more. HANG. There is a slight mistake here. It is a remarkable fact that, contrary to the usual rule, the A.S. hangian, though a weak verb, is intransitive ; whilst kon, the strong form, is transitive. It is due to some confusion; for such is not the case in the cognate tongues. The Icel. hengja, G. hängen, are weak, but transitive; whilst Icel.

HANKER. In the Glossary to Hazlitt's O. Plays, we actually the to ignorance; for heith (= Goth. hauhs) represents a Teut. base find ' hanker. to hang, ix. 379 :' but the reference is wrong. HAREBELL. Spelt kare-belle in the fifteenth century; Wright's Voc. i. 226, col. 2. HARICOT. Wedgwood explains 'haricot beans' from their being 'sliced up in pieces when served at table, and [they] are there-fore called in Du. snijboonen, from snijden, to cut.' He also cites O.F. harigoter, to cut to pieces; Génin, Récréations, i. 46. See Scheler.

HARRIDAN. Wedgwood objects to my definition, but it is fully borne out by the use of it in the passage in Pope to which I refer; and see Grose, as quoted by Halliwell. We actually find, in Neuman's Span -Eng. Dict., harridan explained as (1) caballo viejo, (2) ramera vieja. Some imagine karidelle, harridan to be from Lat. forms aridellus *, aridanus * (from aridus, dry); but such forms are not to be found.

HATCH. The dat. kacce occurs in Thorpe's Diplomatarium Evi Saxonici, p. 395, I. 11. (T. N. Toller.) Also in a Charter of Eadred, A.D. 055. Cf. Prompt Parv. p. 231, note 2. HAUGHTY. The M.E. kautin became kawtyn (Book of St.

Albans, fol. a. s) and then kawty (Palsgrave). * HAWSE, HAWSE-HOLE (Scand.). 'Hawses, two large round holes in a ship, under the head or beak, through which the cables pass, when the ship lies at anchor;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Cf. 'I was forced to cut cable in the knuse;' Eng. Garner, vii. 83 (ab. 1606). So called because made in the 'neck' or bow of the ship. - Icel. hals, hals, the neck ; also (as a sea-term) part of the bow of a ship or boat. Cf. Du hals, neck; halsklamp, a hawse-hole; Dan. and Swed. hals, neck, also a tack (as a sea-term). Also A.S. heals, G. hals, neck; cf. Lat. collum, neck. ¶ Distinct from hawser; see below.

HAWSER, HALSER, a small cable. (F., -L.) [Under this heading, Wedgwood notes (I believe rightly) that I have mixed up two different things. Howser, properly a 'tow-rope,' is of F. origin, whilst kawse is 'a round hole through which the anchor-cable runs,' and is of Scand. origin. The words have, accordingly, a purely accidental resemblance, which certainly caused me to fall into a trap. The right etymology of knuse is given just above. As for that of knuser, it follows here.] 'Hawser, a three-stroud [three strand?] rope, or small cable, which serves for many uses at sea, to draw a ship over a bar, or to fasten the main and fore-shrouds;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Kersey, ed. 1715, merely gives 'Hawser, a three-stroud (sic) rope, or small cable.' In Sherwood, Index to Cotgrave, halser means a tow-rope. In Grafton's Chron., Rich. III., an. 3, we read : 'He wayed up his ancors and halsed [hoisted] up his sayles.' In Blount's Glossographia, 1674, we find: 'Halsier (katsiarius) he that hales or drawes a Ship or Barge along the River by a Rope or Aalser.' Formed, with suffix er, from the F. verb hauls-er, hauss-er, 'to hoise, raise, elevate;' Cot. This verb also had once the sense ' to tow a boat,' as appears from the derivative haulserée, ' the drawing or haling of barges up a river by the force of men ashore;' Cot. It also meant to hoist, which explains the word kalsed in the extract from Grafton above. Hausser is the same word as Ital. alzare, to raise, lift up, elevate, whence were formed O. Ital. alzana, 'a halse to draw a bote withall,' and alzaniere, 'a halsier or he that haleth a ship, a halse or halsier [hawser] in a ship;' Florio. - Low Lat. altiare, to elevate (Ducange) .- Lat. altus, high; see Altitude, Altar.

HEBREW. Heb. 'ivri is a gentilic name, and could not have been applied to Abraham simply as a 'crosser over.' The best ex-planation is that the word means 'one of a people dwelling in 'éver (in the Bible, Heber),' i. e. the land 'beyond' the Euphrates; from the root 'avar, to cross over. 'Hebrew' was the name by which the Israelites were called by Semitic non-Israelites; because they had come originally from the East of the Euphrates.—A. L. M. HEDGE. The M. E. hegge properly answers to A. S. hecg, like edge = A. S. ecg; I find the gen. hegge (for heege) in a Charter of Offa, A.D. 785. The closely allied A. S. hege does not account for the form hedge, but only for the M. E. kei or kai, spelt kay in the Rom. of the Rose, l. 54; see hay in Halliwell. Cf. F. haie, of Teut. origin. HEIFER. I should have been more exact here. The A.S.

heidhfore (sometimes heidfore, and even heidhfru, as in Wright's Voc. i. 287, col. 2) is feminine, like heifer in mod. E. It can only be connected with A.S. fear (better fearr) by referring each to the same root. In this view, the fem. for-e corresponds to Gk. mop-1s, a heifer, in being formed directly from  $\checkmark$  PAR, to produce; and keik-fore would mean 'fully-grown heifer' or 'cow.'  $\beta$ . But A. S. fearr, an would mean 'fully-grown heifer' or 'cow.'  $\beta$ . But A. S. fearr, an ox, cognate with Icel. farri, and allied to G. farre (and the fem. unswers to an Aryan form PAR-SI (Fick, i. 664), fä≈

٦t. ¶ To imagine any connection between vfer, a goat (as in Palmer's Folk-Etymology), is HAUHA (Fick, iii. 76), whilst hæfer represents a Teut. base HAFRA (id. iii. 64). Anything may be made out of anything by neglecting all phonetic laws. Whatever be the etymology of keifer, the first syllable, in A.S., is heih, high. Cf. 'fearr obde heafre,' Levit. iii. 1, where fearr and heithfore represent the male and female of the same animal. The M.E. hekfere is an altered form, made as though from hek, a heck, enclosure (unless k represents the aspirate), and fere, pat for fore.

HEIRLOOM. M. E. heyr-lome, A.D. 1424; in Early E. Wills,

ed. Furnivall, p. 56, 1. 32. HEMLOCK. The A.S. forms are hemlic, hymlice : also hymblice, with excrescent b; see A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 331. The M. E. forms are hemlok, and humlok, humloke, homelok, as cited. The form homelok seems to point to the omission of a second syllable; it seems to me probable that hym-lice is for hyn-lice* = hune-lice* or hune-lice*, that i., stinking leek 'or plant. Hune occurs as another name for har-hune, hoar-hound : A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 42. We might then compare kine with Gk. κών-ειον (Lat. con-ium), hemlock, κον-λη, an origannm (strong-scented plant), Lat. ci-cu-ta, hemlock, cun-ire, 'stercus facere,' in-quin-are, to pollute. Skt. kun apa, carrion; all from & KUN or KWAN, to stink, Skt. knúy, to stink. See Fick, i. 51 ; Vaniček, 163. See Hoarhound.

HERIOT. Anglo-F. Aeriet, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 213. Cor-rupted from the A.S. by Norman scribes.

HERRING. If herring is so called with reference to the fish appearing in large shoals, cf. W. ysgadan, herrings, from cad, a bost or army. (D. Silvan Evans.) HEYDAY (2). Smollett actually writes: 'in the kigk-day of youth and exultation: 'Humphrey Clinker, 1771, ii. 50 (Davies).

HIERARCHY. Spelt yerarchy, Skelton, Dethe of the Erle of Northumberlande, 211.

HIGGLE. Perhaps (O. Low G) rather than (E). Wedgwood suggests that the likeness to kaggle is deceptive, and that the verb to kiggle is merely made out of the sb. kiggler. This is very probable; and we may then look upon higgler (as he suggests) as being a form of one of the numerous words noted under Huckster. In particular, the Du. heukelaar, a huckster, retailer (Sewel) comes sufficiently near, and we may easily have borrowed the word (not in early use) from the Low Countries. Wedgwood also cites Bavarian hughler, a petty dealer, der. from hughe, a pack on the back; cf. Bavar. huckeln, to put on the back, hocken, hucken, to be hunched up; Schmeller, 1050, 1072. This is to the point, as being an allied form.

HINT. Perhaps (Scand.), not (E). Wedgwood's suggestion, of a connection with Icel. ymta, to mutter, ymtr, a muttering (from mar. a humming sound), Dan. ymte, to whisper about a thing, is well worthy of consideration. He cites the Dan. sentence: 'og intet ord, som ymtede hans Forsæt,' i.e. and not a word, that gave a hint of his purpose. My own impression (at present) is that hint really represents these Scand. words, the  $\lambda$  being added by confusion with M. E. kinten, to catch, already cited. The change of mt to nt was, of course, inevitable, as in aunt, ant, Hants. And I remain of opinion that these Scand. words are likewise of use in explaining the difficult word inkling, in spite of some derisive remarks that have been made upon my account of the word at p. 294. I see no difficulty in regarding inkle as being put for int-le\*, the regular frequentative form of the verb to int\*, here supposed to be the original form of hint. As to sense, the connection is of the closest. As to form, Cotgrave, s. v. andoilliers, writes ankler for antler; and the h is unoriginal in hawghty. haunch, hautboy, hawser, hermit, howl, and yellow-hammer. Cf. M. Müller, Lect. ii. 184 (8th ed.).

HIP (2). A. S. heipe is the full form ; Wright's Voc. i. 30, col. 2. HIPPISH, HIP (1). The following curious quotation shews that the verb to hip was really formed from the sb. hypochondria, and arose at Cambridge as a piece of University slang. 'It is observable that among the University Men [at Cambridge], that allmost half of them are Hypt, as they call it, that is, disordered in their brains, sometimes mopish, sometimes wild, the two different effects of their laziness and debauchery; ' note by Dr. J. Edwards (died 1716), in a fragment printed in Report of Camb. Antiquarian Soc., 1878, p. 130. HISTORY. We even find A. S. istoria (Grein).

HIVE. The A.S. was prob. hyfe (with long y); we find also Alvearia, hyfa; alvearii, hyfe; ' Mone, Quellen, pp. 333, 334. It is, moreover, a very old word, occurring as hyfi (= hyfi) in the Corpus glossary of the 8th century. Sweet gives \*kupio as the presumable prehistoric Arvan form whence it would regularly be descended. This makes it co-radicate with Cup and Colf; and the orig. sense would be 'vessel' or 'cup.' In any case, it is to be noted that the A. S. vowel was j, from Aryan  $\tilde{u}$ , the base being KUP-; see root no. 78, p. 73. The suggestion at p. 267 as to a connection with  $\sqrt{KI}$  and A. S. kiwise is entirely wrong. Delete all the article except the references.

HOARDING. Not (Du.), but (F., - Du.). The Anglo-F. pl.

Aurdys, hoardings, occurs in the Lib. Albus, p. 477. HOBBY (1). Cf hoby, a small horse, occurring A.D. 1420; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 53; hoby, ab. 14co, Reliq. Antiq. ii. 23.

HOD. Not (F., - G.), but (E.). I at once accept Wedgwood's correction. Hod is no corruption of F. hotte (as said in Webster and Worcester), which describes a different kind of receptacle, but is simply the prov. E. Mod, a receptacle or 'hold,' borrowed from Northern and E. Anglian dialects. Hod, as used by Tusser, is E. Anglian, and is given by Forby and Moor. Miss Baker mentions coal hod and cinder-hod, as known in Northamptonshire. Nall notes E. Angl. hodding-spade as a spade used in the fens, shaped to take up large portions of the earth entire, i. e. a holding-spade.' Hod for hold is very widely spread, occurring in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, while Shropshire has houd or hout. Ray, in 1691, already notes hod, to hold, as occurring in 'various dialects' in the North. The clearest examples are in the Whitby Glossary; a powder-kod, a flask for powder; 'has he a good kod,' i. e. holding power, capacity, ability; a cannle-kod, a candle-stick, &cc. See also the Holderness Thus hod is simply hold or 'receptacle,' a pure E. word. Glossary. See Hold. There is no example of hot, a basket, in English, as far as I know.

HOG. The Celtic origin of this word is, after all, very doubtful, though it is the one most usually given. I think it is better to adopt the suggestion of E. Müller, who connects it with the verb to hack. It seems to me to be derived from the Lowland Scotch hag, to cut (a weakened form of hack), whence also haggle and haggis. This is well borne out by M. E. kogge, 'maialis, est enim porcus carens testiculis;' Catholicon Anglicum, p. 187. Mr. Herrtage carens testicults; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 167. Mr. Heritage cites from Baret: 'a barrowe hog, a gilt or gelded hog, maialis;' also Aog-pigs, barrow-pigs, Whitby Glossary. Hence we may ex-plain Aog, a young sheep, Aog-colt, a yearling colt, and the other similar prov. E. forms in Halliwell, such as Aogat, a two-year old shinar prov. E. Johns in Hainweil, such as nogel, a two-point of sheep, hoggaster, a boar in its third year, hoggerel, which Palsgrave explains by 'a yong shepe,' hoglin, a boar. So also prov. G. hacksh, a boar (Flügel); from kacken, to cut. The suggested W. origin is plainly inadequate. It is remarkable that we find prov. E. hog, verb, to cut the hair short; see Miss Baker's Northants. Gloss., Halliwell, and Holloway's Dict. of Provincialisms. This verb is by Holloway derived from the sb. kog, but it may well be that the etvmology runs the other way. Indeed, Mr. Cockayne explains log as a cut boar, a hog-sheep as one whose wool is clipped the first year, and a hog-mane as one cut near the neck; Spoon and Sparrow,

p. 79. HOGSHEAD. 'The hoggis hed [has] lxiij. galons; 'Arnold's Chron., ed. 1811, p. 190. Hexham's Du. Dict. (1658) has 'cxhooft, a hog's-head.' Spelt hoggesheed in Palsgrave (1530). The earliest hog's head.' Spelt hoggesheed in Palsgrave (1530). quotation I have yet met with is: 'pypys and hoggys hedys of wyne;' Gregory's Chron. of London, 1460, p. 207 (Camden Soc.). In the Chron. of Calais (Camd. Soc.), p. 50 (A.D. 1500) we find: 'ii. Aos-hedys of ypocras.' Here hos (says Mr. F. Hall) appears to be simply In the the Du. os, an ox, with the A gratuitously prefixed. The Gael. toosaid is merely borrowed from E. Aogshead; cf. Gael. taigeis = E. Aoggis. See C. H. H. Wright, Irish Gram., 1855, p. 6, rule I. HOIST. Palsgrave has the forms Ayce and Ayse, which completely settle the etymology.

HOLE. I think section y may be omitted; and I doubt whether Curtius can be right. The A.S. hol follows so easily from A.S. hol-en, pp. of helan, to hide, that it seems best to keep to the solution in section  $\beta$ .

HOLLAND. I am told that Dutch etymologists explain the word as holt-land, i. e. woodland; see Holt. The word occurs in 1502. 'A pece [of] holland or ony other lynnen cloth conteyneth lx ellis;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 206. Still earlier we find : 'A shert of feyn Halond; ' Cov. Myst. p. 241. HOLLYHOCKS. versary, l. 20. HONEYSUCKLE, Cf. 'Ligustrum, Aunisuce;' Wright's Voc.

HOOP (1). The A.S. kop-páda, a kind of cope, in Wright's Voc. i. 59, possibly contains an example of hop = hoop.

HOP (2). We find: 'volubilis major, hoppe;' where hoppe is an Old Westphalian (Old Saxon) form; Mone, Quellen, p. 292. The word appears as early as in Arnold's Chronicle (ab. 1502), in the pl. form hopps or hopps, ed. 1811, pp. 236, 246; and hops are frequently mentioned in the Northumberland Household Book, 1512. See Catholicon Anglicum, p. 28, note 8. The exx. in Arnold occur in what seems to be a list of imports, doubtless from Holland, Palsgrave has: 'hoppes for beer, houblon.' Perhaps the A.S. gloss 'hopu, lygustra' refers to hops; A.S. Leechdoms, iii, 332.

HOPE (1). A.S. hopa, hope, occurs in the simple form in Ælfric's

HOPE (2). An earlier example of forlorn hope occurs in An Eng. Garner, vii. 128, where Sir F. Vere is describing the battle of Nieuwport (S. W. of Ostend) in the year 1600. This directly connects the phrase with the Dutch language.

HORDE. Zenker, in his Turk. Dict., gives urdu, ordi, orda, urdů, a camp, p 117. The word is of Tatar origin; M. Pavet de Courteille, in his Dict. Turk-Oriental, gives úrdů, 'campement royal, camp; p 54. Thence it found its way into Turkish and Persian. HORNET. As to the derivation of A.S. hyrnette from horn, there can be no question, y being the vowel regularly substituted for o in such derivatives. But the reason assigned (as suggested by Skinner and others) that it is so named from its antennæ, is not the right one. It is so named from the loud sound which it makes, as if blowing a horn. (Cf. ' the beetle winds His small but sullen horn;' Collins, Ode to Evening, st. 3.) This is shewn by Weigand, in discussing the cognate G. Aorniss, a hornet; and he points out that the Low G. name for hornet was 'horn-bearer.' See Kleinere altniederdeutsche Denkmäler, ed. Heyne, p. 89, l. 13, where we find the Low-G. gloss: 'crabrones, horno-beron,' HOUSEL. Fick connects Goth. hunsl with Lith. szwentas, Ch.

Slav. svetu, holy (cf. Russ. sviatoi, holy), and Zend speni/a, holy. For the correspondence of the initial letters, cf. A. S. hwit with Russ. swietite, to shine; see White. If this be right, the orig. sense of Goth. huns! was 'a holy rite.' HOUSINGS. The term houss, is of rather early occurrence. It occurs in the Catholicon Anglicum, spelt hourse (A.D. 1483). Mr. Herrtage refers to the Household and Wardrobe Expenses of Edw. II., ed. Furnivall, p. 43; but the MS. referred to is only a very late translation from the French, made in 1601.

HOVER. I understand that Prof. Rhys takes the W. hofio to be borrowed from E. Thus the derivation given is quite correct.

HOW (1). March makes A.S. Aú and A.S. Awý precisely the same word. See Why. HOWITZER. Jungmann's Bohemian Dict. (1835), vol. i.

p. 662, has- haufnice, haufenice, lithobolus, ballista minor, quæ saxa seu lapides torquebat ... eine Haubitze, ein Granatengeschütz.' The M. H. G. form (15th cent.) was hawffnitz (Weigand).

HOWL. Add: Du. huilen. + Icel. yla. + Dan. hyle. + Swed. yla, to howl

HUDDLE. It may be as well to point out that there is no contradiction in the passage from Rob. Manning, in l. 8. It means that the Scots, as an army, were scattered or dispersed, and thus broken up into small knots of men who were huddled together in huts for refuge. Cf. Shropsh. hod, to cover potatoes with straw and soil, to protect them from frost; hod, a store-heap of such potatoes; hud, to collect, gather together. The ideas of hiding, covering, and heaping together seem to me to be all connected with kudd-le. HUGE. Cf. Anglo-F. akogement, hugely, Gaimar's Chron. 5669. HUGUENOT. There is an earlier use of the name than that cited by Littré. In Will. of Palerne, 1. 362, occurs the name Hugonet, where the F. original (earlier than A.D. 1350) has Hugenet. The variation in the suffix is unimportant; all the forms (Huguenot, Hugonet, Hugenet) being diminutives of F. Hugues. HULK. We find A.S. hule as a gloss to liburna, Wright's Voc. i.

56; and Low Lat. Aulcus in Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, i. 300, 1. 5.

HULL (2), the body of a ship. Not (E.), but (Du.) It occurs also in Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 60. But there is an example in M. E., where it is spelt koll. 'The gudes that that robbed In koll gan that it hide,' L. Minot, in Polit. Poems, ed. Wright, p. 88. This renders it almost certain that the word is not E. at all, but borrowed from Du. hol; Sewel has: 'het hol van een schip, the ships hold or hull.' See also Hold (2), which is the same word. It hence appears that the Du. hol, not being understood, was assimilated, sometimes to hold (as if it contained the cargo), and sometimes to hull (as if it were the shell of the ship). It is really the same word as E. hole. In the Prompt. Parv., we find both 'hoole of pesyn,' i.e. hull or shell of peas, and 'hoole, or holle of a schyppe;' but we also find 'hoole or pyt;' shewing that hull (1), hull (2), and hole were all pronounced alike in Norfolk, in 1440. HURDYGURDY. Compare 'harryng and garryng,' i.e. snarling and growling, used by Trevis1; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris by the fact that we also find the form invict, from the pp. invictan. and Skeat, p. 241. The play of Midas (1764) is by O'Hara, not by 'Fool that I am. thus to invict against her;' Beaum. and Fletcher. and Skeat, p. 241. The play of Midas (1764) is by O'Hara, not by The line occurs in Act 1. Foote.

HURLYBURLY. It first occurs (probably) in Bale, Kynge Johan, ed. Collier, p. 63, l. 21.

HUSSAR. The Hungarian word Ausz, twenty, will be found in Dankovsky, Magyar Lexicon, ed. 1833; see pp. 462, 469. He also gives Hung. huszár, meaning (1) a keeper of geese, and (2) a hussar horseman. It is worth noting that these appear to be quite distinct words; huszár, a hussar, is from húsz, twenty, as already given; but in the sense of keeper of geese, the word is not Hungarian, but Slavonic, i. e. from Bohemian hus, a goose ; cf. Russ. guse, a goose. See Jungmann's Bohemian Dict.

HUSSIF. Correctly spelt Aussy in Richardson's Pamela (1741), ed. 1811, i. 162: 'I . . dropt purposely my kussy.' (Davies.) The M. E. term was nedylle-howse, or nedyl-hows; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 250.

HYPOTENUSE. To be marked as (F., -L., -Gk.).

IBIS. The pl. ibes is in Mandeville's Travels, p. 45. The Coptic form of the word is hippen, occurring as a bird-name in Levit. xi. 17, Deut. xiv. 16, where the Vulgate has ibis, and the LXX version has IBis; see Peyron, Coptic Dict. p. 358, and Smith, Dict. Bible, s. v. Owl.

IMPOVERISH. Perhaps not a corrupt form; cf. Anglo-F. enpoverist, pt. t. sing., Langtoit's Chron. i. 286; empoverie, pp., Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 311. The E. pp. impoveryekyd occurs in Orig. Letters. ed. Ellis, i. 155 (1519). IMPRINT. M.E. emprenten, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, ed. Morris,

This throws some light upon both imprint and print; the former is emprint with change of em- to im-, to make it look more like Latin. The latter is emprint, with loss of the former syllable. INCREASE. Found in Anglo-French; the infin is encrestre, IPECACUANHA. The Brazilian name is said to be i-pe-conguen, or 'smaller road-side sick-making plant ;' Athenæum, Jan. 18.

1879, p. 88. IRON-MOULD ; see MOULD (3), p. 818. IRRECONCILABLE. To be marked as (F., - L.).

JACKAL. The Pers. shaghal is allied to Skt. prigala, which is prob. from an imitative root, and means 'howler;' cf. VKARK, no. 59, p. 732. But the Heb. shu al is quite a different word, being from sha al, to dig, hollow out (Delitzsch).

JADE (1), a sorry nag, an old woman. (Scand.) In Chancer, as cited, the MSS. have Iade. Here the I rather represents y than j, as the word is certainly the same as the Lowl. Scotch yad, yade, yaid, yaud, a jade. Jamieson gives yad as the form in Ramsay's Scot. Prov. p. 42; yaid in Dunbar's Poems, yade in Ritson's S. Songs, i. 197; and yaud as a common mod. form. Yaud seems the best form, as an I has been lost, and it stands for yald. - Icel. jalda, a mare. Cf. Prov. Swed. jüldä, a mare (Rietz). Origin obscure: perhaps related to Geld. Cf. also Icel. júl4r, a gelding, Norweg. gielk, the same; Prov. Swed. jälk, a stallion; Norweg. gjelka, jalka. to geld.

JADE (1). Max Müller's letter says: 'The jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards piedra de yjada [or ijada], because for a long time it was believed to cure pain in the side. For similar reasons it was afterwards called lapis nethritis, nephrite, &c. This ijada became jada by loss of initial i, and lastly jade, the present Span. form.' Phillips (1706) has: 'Nephriticus lapis, a sort of green stone brought from the Indies and Spain, which is used in Nephritick Pains.' Nephritic is from Gk. reppires, disease in the kidneys; from veppos, kidney.

\*JAPE, to jest, mock, befool. (F., - Scand.) Obsolete. In Chaucer, C. T. 1731, 13623; P. Plowm. B. i. 67. Apparently confused with F. japper, to bark as a dog, but answering rather to F. gaber, 'to mock, flout, gull, cheat,' Cot.; which has just the same sense as jape. Roquefort has gap = gab, mockery. – Icel. gabba, to sense as jape. Roquefort has gap = gab, mockery. - Icel. gabba, to mock; gabb, mockery. See Gabble, Jabber; and cf. Gibe. JAUNT. Wedgwood contests the etymology given, being unable to trace the connection between 'jolting,' which he takes to be the sense of jaunce, and 'playing tricks,' as seen in the Swed. ganta. He rightly adduces the Norfolk jounce, 'to bounce, thump, and jolt, as rough riders are wont to do.' The fact is, that my treatment of the word is rather inadequale than wrong. There are clear traces of word is rather inadequate than wrong. There are clear traces of two parallel Teutonic bases GANT and GAMP, both with the sense of 'to act as a buffoon.' It was the business of a buffoon both to jest in words, and to use violent, ungainly motions, bobs, and jerks (which must have been tiring exercise) for the amusement of the spectators. Of these bases, GAMP (which I take to be a better form than GAMB, as in Fick) is mentioned under Jump (1); but much is omitted. Not only is it related to the words there mentioned, but it is the source of Bavar. gumpen, gumpela, meaning not only to jump about (as already said), but, actively, to toss about, to pump water, the underlying idea being that of violent motion; Schmeller, i. 914; gumpend, gumpig, active, waggish; gumpelmecht, a fool; gumpelman, a buffoon, id. 915. But the great variety of senses is much more remarkably exemplified in Lowl. Sc. jaumph, commoner as jamph, 'to make game of, sneer, mock, shuffle, jilt, trifle, spend time idly, walk slowly or idly (Banfish.); also to tire, fatigue, chafe, destroy by jogging or friction, to drive to difficulties, a fool, blockhead; Swed. dial. gamp, a fool, droll (Rietz). When we remember the tricks of the old buffoons, we can understand why Swed. gump means the posteriors, whilst the Swed. dial. gimpa or gumpa, means to wriggle with the gump; cf. Dan. gumpe, to jolt, gimpe, to see-saw. Here is ample evidence as to how 'playing  $\stackrel{\oplus}{\to}$  Similarly the jenneling must have received its name from being in tricks' is consistent with violent action.  $\beta$ . But a parallel form some places ripe on St. John's day, though in England it is not ripe  $\beta$ . But a parallel form GANT also appears in Swed. dial. ganta, gantas, already cited; Dan. gante, a fool; Lowl. Sc. jaunt, jaunder, already cited; and we can hardly disconnect these from the base GANK, as seen in Lowl. Sc. jink, 'to dodge, cheat, trick, to make a quick turn, move nimbly, move quickly (as a fiddle bow), to dance, spend time idly,' Jamieson; where we again remark the wide range of senses. So also Lowl. Sc. jinker, a sprightly girl, a wag, a horse that turns quickly; jank, to trifle (synonymous with jamph), jankit, fatigued, jaded; and perhaps even jouk, to shift the body aside quickly, to shift. It is clearly to the Scand, dialects that we should turn for the word, and esp. for the Scotch forms. Note that Palsgrave has the form gaunce (apparently with a hard g), in the sense to ride a horse hard. Cf. also North of E. jant, merry (Halliwell); and high-jinks, a fling, frolic.

JAUNTY. The spelling jaunty is due to the verb jaunt, with which it was easily linked, but it seems better to suppose that the true origin of jounty was French, and it may be marked as (F., -L.). In this case, it is not really related to jount at all, but was merely confused with it. It was formerly spelt janty, the earliest example being that given in Todd's Johnson, which perhaps points to a supposed French origin. 'Not every one that brings from beyond seas a new gin, or janty device, is therefore a philosopher;' Hobbes Considered (1662). So also: 'A good janty way of begging;' and 'this is your janty nephew,' in The Parson's Wedding (1603), in Hazlitt's Old Plays, xiv, 401, 506. 'This jantee Sleightness to the French we owe;' T. Shadwell, Timon, p. 71 (1688). In the Spectator, no. 503, 'a janty part of the town' means 'a genteel part.' Mr. Davies notes that it is often spelt janté or jantée, as if it were a F. word, and 'still wore its foreign dress.' Thus Farquhar has: 'Turn your head about with a jante air;' The Inconstant, Act 1. B. The explanation that it ' wore its foreign dress' is really no explanation, since there is no such word in French, and it is not easy to say how it came about. The F. jante means a felly of a wheel, which has clearly nothing to do with the matter, but Cotgrave notes that this jante was also spelt gente, shewing confusion between initial gen- and jan. The suffix  $-\dot{e}$  is mere pseudo-French, and the word is not a pp. from a verb genter (there being no such verb). Y. The original is the F. gent, masc., gente, fem., 'neat, spruce, fine, compt, well arranged, quaintly dressed, also gentle, pliant, soft, easie; 'Cot. This word was actually borrowed by us, and appears as gent, spruce, gay, in Phillips (1706), Kersey, Bailey, &c., as well as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 9, 27. Or else we may suppose that janty is short for jantyl, an occasional F. spelling of gen-8. These two explanations are practically identical, since teel. Littré shows that F. gent is merely an adaptation of F. gentil, rather than an independent formation from L. genitus. We are thus led to consider janty as being a mere doublet of gentle or genteel, which are in fact identical. Cf. 'So jimply lac'd her genty waist;' Burns, Bonie Ann.

JAW. I now believe that the words jowl and chaps, though allied to each other, are entirely unconnected with jaw; and that Dan. kjæve, a jaw (allied to A. S. ceafl) has nothing to do with O. Du. kanwe, the resemblance, such as it is, being purely accidental. I should refer chaps, chops, gape, jowl, jole (together with Dan. kjæve), to V GABH, no. 90, p. 733; but chaw or jaw and chew are from the Teut. base KAU, to chew (Fick, iii. 38), which is perhaps allied to  $\checkmark$ GU, to low, no. 103, p. 733. My mistake was due to confusing Dan. kjæve (base kaf-, the v being for f) with O. Du. kauwen (base kuw-, ku-). The connection between jaw and chew is obvious in the O. H. G. forms. Cf. O. H. G. chiwa, chiewa, chewa, M. H. G. kiuwe, chiwe, kouwe, jaw, with O. H. G. chiwan, chiuwan, M. H. G. kiuwen. G. kauen, to chew. See Wackernagel, s. v. kiuwe. Palsgrave has chawe-bone. sb., and chawe, vb.

JEHOVAH. This form is due to the divine name being pointed, in the Heb. scriptures, with the vowels of another word. The original pronunciation was yakueh, the etymology of which is entirely unknown.-A. L. M.

JELLY. Spelt gely, Arnold's Chron (1502), ed. 1811, p. 239. JENNETING. In Hogg's Fruit Manual, 4th ed. p. 77, it is proposed to connect this with F. Jean, John. He cites from J. B. Porta the following: 'Est genus alterum pomorum] quod quia circa festum Divi Joannis maturiscit (sic), vulgus Melo de San Giovanni dicitur.' And again, from Tragus, Hortorum, p. 522, 'Quæ apud nos prima maturantur, Sanct Johans Oppfell (sic), Latine, Præcocia mala dicuntur.' Cotgrave has: 'Pomme de S. Jean, or Hastivel, a soon-ripe apple called the St. John's apple.' This leaves little doubt as to the ultimate origin being from F. Jean. There is also a pear called Amiré Joannet, or Admiré Joannet, also Joannet, Jeanette, Petit St. Jean, in German Johannisbirn, which 'ripens in July, so called from being ready for use in some parts of France about Malayálim Dict., p. 304 St. John's day, the 24th of June;' Hogg's Fruit Manual, p. 361. Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

till July. As to the form of the word, it answers best to F. Jeanneton ; for, although this is a feminine form, we have just seen that the early pear is called both Joannet and Jeanette. We find a mention of pere-ionettes, i.e. Jeannot pears, as early as in Piers Plowman, C. xiii. 221. It is much more likely that jenneting = Jeanneton, than that the suffix -ing was afterwards added, for no intelligible reason.

JERK. We find jerts in the very sense of jerks, i. e. cuts with a whip, in Dodsley's O. Plays, ii. 194; also 'I jerted [i.e. smacked] my whip,' id. viii. 52.

JESSES. We actually find both gesse and gesses used as pl. forms in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b 5, back. 'Gesses for a hauke, getz;' Palsgrave. Hence M. E. gesse = F. jets, as I supposed; and jesses is a double plural.

JEW. Anglo F. Jue, Year-books of Edw. I., iii. 355; Geu, Stat. of the Realm, i. 221, an. 1276; pl. Jeus, id. i. 54, an. 1283. These forms correspond to an O.F. sing. form Jueu (see Scheler). from Lat. Judaum, acc. of Judaus. Scheler explains that Jueu subsequently JINGLE. Jink is actually the prov. E. word for chink; see glossaries of Craven dialect, Leic. (Evans), Northants. (Baker), and Halliwell. Palsgrave gives the sb. gyngle-geangle. JOCKEY. We find Jockey for Jack in 1632, in a Woman Never Vexed, in Dodsley's O. Plays, xii. 156; and earlier, in Skelton's Works, ed. Dyce, i. 185, l. 91. Cf. Shak. Rich. III. v. 3. 304.

JOG. Jog may be a mere corruption of shog, though it makes but little difference. We actually find j for initial sh in the form jeltron, put for sheltron, a shelter, or shield, in Hickscorner; Dodsley's

O. Plays, i. 149. JOHN DORY. On what authority the statement rests that this fish is called janitore in Venice (see Palmer, Folk-Etymology), I know not. If it be true, it has still nothing to do with the E. name, as asserted by some. We already find, says Mr. Palmer, the following mention of the dory in pt. iii. 1. 561 of the De Laudibus Divinæ Sapientiæ of Alexander Neckam, who died in 1217: 'Gustum doreæ quæ nomen sumpsit ab auro.' This is conclusive. We find mention of 'the goldfish or doree' in Holland, tr. of Pliny (1634), b. xxxii. c. 11; 'Dorrey, a see fysshe,' in Palsgrave (1530); also the Anglo-F. dore, a dory, in the Liber Albus, p. 234, and Low Lat. doracus in the Gloss. to the Liber Custumarum. For the etymology of John, see Zanv

JORDAN. The river-name is rather (Heb.) than (Arab.). Heb. Yardén, i.e. flowing down; from the Heb. root yarad, to descend,

(A. L. M.) JUG. We actually find an expression parallel to 'jug of beer' in jack of beer,' which occurs in Dodsley's O. Plays, ed. Hazlitt, vii. 218, ix. 441. From the fact of Jug being a female name, we also find jug, a mistress, a term of endearment, id. iv. 183, vi. 511, viii. 400, xii. 115.

JUNGLE. (Hind., - Skt.) 'Hind. Jangal, jungul (also in other dialects), a forest, a thicket, any tract overrun with bushes or trees; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 230. - Skt. jaigala, adj., dry, desert (as already given).

JUNK (1). 'Even whole junks' full, being a kind of barks made like unto our barges;' An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, ii. 125. This occurs in the account of Cavendish's voyage in 1586, written in 1588. The said junks were seen near Java.

' The *JUTE, a substance resembling hemp. (Bengáli. - Skt.) jute of commerce is the product of two plants of the order of Tiliacea, viz. Corchorus capsularis and Corchorus olitorius . . the leaves . . are employed in medicine . . dried leaves prepared for this purpose being found in almost every Hindu house in some districts of Bengal . . Its recognition as a distinct plant [from hemp] dates from the year 1795, when Dr. Roxburgh, Superintendent of the East India Company's Botanical Garden at Seebpoor, forwarded a bale prepared by himself, under its present name of jute ;' Overland Mail, July 30, 1875, p. 17 (which contains a long article on Jute). - Bengali jut, joot, 'the fibres of the bark of the Corchorus olitorius, much used for making a coarse kind of canvas, and the common gami bags; it is also some-times loosely applied to the plant;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 243. - Skt. jata (with cerebral t), matted hair, as worn by the god Çiva and by ascetics, hence a braid; of which a less usual form is juta. It appears, from the Dict. by Böhtlingk and Koth, that this Skt. word was sometimes applied to the fibrous roots of a tree, descending from the branches, as in the case of the banyan, &c. Hence the extension of meaning to fibrous substances, and to jute. Cf. Malayálim jat, (1) the matted hair of Shiva or of Hindu ascetics, (2) the fibrous roots of a tree descending from the branches; Bailey, Malayálim Dict., p. 304. See also a letter by J. S. Cotton in The KANGAROO. In Cook's Voyages, under the date July 14, & or 'man-child;' Chaucer uses knowe child for 'man-child,' C. T. 1709 [mispinted 1700], he says; 'this animal is called by the natives kanguroo.' See N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 58. • KEELHAUL. (Scand. and E.) Also keelhale, 'to punish in the seaman's way, by dragging the criminal under water on one side the scaman's way, by oragging the criminal under water on one side of the ship and up again on the other; 'Johnson. Formerly called keel-raking (Phillips). A less severe punishment was ducking at the main-yard (Phillips). From keel (1) and kale (2). KERN (1), an Irish soldier. The derivation is from Irish ceathar-nach, a soldier (the th and ch being hardly sounded). - Irish cath, a battle, whence also cathfear, a soldier (from fear, a man). So also Gael. ceatharnach, a soldier, fighting man (E. cateran), from cath, battle. And cf. W. cadarn, powerful. The Irish and Gael cath, W. cad, battle, is cognate with A. S. headu, battle; see Fick, i. 56. KERSEY. Palsgrave has 'Carsey clothe, cresy.' This is an earlier example : and helps to shew that Kersey is short for Kersey cloth.

\* KESTREL, a base kind of hawk. (F., -L.) In Spenser, F.Q. ii. 3. 4; spelt castrel, Beaum. and Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 1; kastril, Ben Jonson, Epicœne, iv. 4; see Nares. The t is excrescent (as after s in whils-t, amongs-t); it stands for kes'rel, short for kers'rel. - O. F. quercerelle, 'a kastrell;' Cot. Put for quercelelle \*, the regular dimin. of quercelle, 'a kastrell,' Cot. - Lat. querquedula, a kind ot teal ; see Diez and Scheler. From the imitative  $\checkmark$  KARK, to make a loud noise; cf. croak. creak, chirk, &c.  $\beta$ . See also, in Cotgrave, the forms Ercolle, a teal; cercerelle, a kestrel, teal; crecerelle, a kestrel; mod. F. crécerelle. The form cercelle is mod. F. sarcelle; see Littré, under crécelle, crécerelle, sarcelle; Diez, under cerceta, the Spanish form. The Ital. tristarello, a kestrel (Florio), stands for cristarello \*; cf. Burgundian cristel, a kestrel, a form cited by Wedgwood. (See my letter to The Academy, Oct. 7, 1882, p. 262.) \*KHEDIVE, a prince. (F., - Pers.) A Turkish title given to the governor of Egypt ; the word itself is, however, not Turkish, but borrowed from Persian. - F. Khedive. - Pers. khadiw. khidiw, khudiw, a king, a great prince, a sovereign, Rich. Dict. p. 601; spelt khidiv, a king, Palmer's Dict. col. 216, where the name for the viceroy of Egypt is given as khidew. Cf. Pers. khodá, God (Vullers, p. 663). KIBE. The W. forms are cibi (fem. y gibi), and cibust. I

Īn N. Wales it is generally called llosg eiria, snow-burning or inflammation. (D. Silvan Evans.) KICK. The W. eie occurs in the Mabinogion in the sense of

'foot;' cicio, to kick, is colloquial. (D. Silvan Evans.) KILDERKIN. The word occurs as early as 1410; 'a hylder hym of ale ;' Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 17, 1. 16. See note to Firkin above.

KILT. Otherwise, it may be Celtic; see Cormac, Gloss. 47, s. v. celt. Celt, vestis, raiment. Cf. Irish cealt, clothes. (A. L. Mayhew.) I confess I doubt this; the explanation I have already given is more likely, as explaining both the Scottish kill, to tuck up, and the Dan. kille. The kill is not exactly 'clothes,' but only a particular part of the dress. Rietz identifies the Swed. dialect kilträ sig, to tuck up one's clothes, with the Sc. to kilt up.

* KIOSK, a Turkish open summer-house, small pavilion. (Turk., - Pers.) In Byron, Corsair, iii. 1. Spelt kiosque in French. - Turk. kushk, köshk, a kiosk; Zenker's Dict., p. 774. - Pers. kushk, a palace, a villa; a portico, or similar projection in a palace, Rich. Dict. p. 1217; a palace, kiosk, Palmer's Dict. col. 496. Devic remarks that the i is due to the Turkish practice of inserting a slight iafter k.

KIT-CAT. 'Immortal made, as Kit-cat by his pies;' W. King, Art of Cookery, let. viii. First pr. in 1708. This well exemplifies the etymology, from the name of a pastry-cook of that period. KITE. The paper hite, as a toy, is mentioned in 1690; see Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, b. iv. c. 4. § 9. Named from a resemblance to a hovering kite or bird.

KNAP. Also cognate with G. knappen, to knap, crack; which see in Weigand. Cf. also Swed. knäpp, a crack, fillip, snap; knäppa, to snap the fingers, fillip, crack; Dan. knep, a crack, fillip, snap. Knap: knack: : clap: crack; all words of initative origin, of which  $\checkmark$  KARK is the type. See Root no. 59, p. 732. Hence it is needless to consider knack, knap, knock, knop as of Celtic origin; they may just as well be Teutonic.

KNAVE. Prob. (E.) Weigand, s. v. knabe, quotes from Diefenbach an Old Gaulish form gnabat, one who is born, a son. This suggests that kn-ave (like kn-ight, q. v.) is a derivative from &GAN, to produce. If so, the latter part of A. S. cn-afa or cn-apa cannot be an ordinary Teut. suffix; but the word must be a compound of two substantives; and we may perhaps compare Goth. aba, a man, husband, and esp. Icel. of, a grandfather, respecting which Vigfussor is sometimes 'used in the sense of a boy or a son , son after father, man after man.' It would use to suppose know to mean 'born a man,' ce 5142; and we may note that know is never applied to a female.

KNOUT. Not (Russ.), but (Russ. - Scand.) Russ. knute is bot Slavonic, but of Scand. origin. - Icel. knútr, a knot. See Thomsen, Anc. Russia and Scandinavia, 1877, p. 128.-A. L. M. Thus know is a mere variant of Knot, q. v.

KNUCKLE. We may particularly remark the O. Du. Inole. Hexham gives : 'De knoest, knoke, ofte Weere van een boom, the knobb or knot of a tree.' So also G. knocken, a knot, bunch.

LABURNUM. Perhaps Lat. laburnum is a variation of alburnum. Cf. 'F. anbour, the cytisus, laburnum, from Lat. alburnum; Brachet. And see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 6, note 3.

LAC (2). The sense of laksha, viz. 100,000, has reference to the number of lac-insects in a nest; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 308. See Lac (1). Wilson adds that the insect constructs its nest in numerous small cells of a resinous substance known as shell-lac.

LADE (1). This strong verb deserves fuller treatment. The pp. laden occurs in M. E. in Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris. I. 1800; Richard Cuer de Lion, l. 1389. The cognate forms are: Du. laden, to lade, load; Icel. klada; Dan. lade; Swed. ladda; Goth. klaikan, only found in the comp. af-klaikan; G. be-laden, O. H. G. hladan. All from the Teut. base HLATH, to lade; Fick, iii. 87.

Cf. Russ. klade, a load, answering to a Teut. base HIAD. LAG. We again find lag, late, in Jacob and Esau, v. 5, in Dodsley's O. Plays, ii. 252, where Esau is said 'of blessing to come lag.' Hence the verbal use, as in : 'Death shall not long lag atter him;' id. x. 48.

LAMA (1). In a Thibetan Dict. by H. A. Jäschke, at p. 650, we are told that the word for 'priest' is blama. LANDSCAPE. 'I give also vnto her La[dishi]pp the landship inamiled vpon gold which is in the Dutch cabinett in my closett; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 216 (A.D. 1648).

LANYARD. Spelt langer, Catholicon Anglicum, p. 208. M.E. lagner, Trevisa, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, v. 369.

LAP (1). The A.S. lapian occurs in Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zapitza, p. 177, l. 11 : ' Lambo, ic liccige obbe lapige,' i.e. I lick or lap. Also in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 184, l. 13. Cf. also Du. leppen, to sip;

Swed läppja, to lap. LAPSE. Cf. Anglo-F. laps de temps, lapse of time; Stat. of the Realm, i. 318, an. 1351. LAPWING. Actually spelt leepwynke in Wycliffe, Levit. xi. 19; cf. lapwynches, pl., in Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 60, l. 24. As late as 1530, we find lapwynke in Palsgrave. LARBOARD. In Hackluyt's Voyages, 1598, i. 4, we find the spellings leereboord and steereboord.

LARCH. Mentioned in Turner's Names of Herbes (1548); p. 46 (E. D. S.). He gives the E. name as larche-tree, the F. as on large, and the G. as ein larchen baume [rather ein lärchen-baum]. Roquefort gives O. F. larege, now obsolete.

LASSO. Not (Port., -L.), as marked in my former edition, but (Span., -L.) A correspondent from Mexico has solved my difficulty; he says that 'in Mexico the masses of the people give : the sound of s, and sound c just as we do;' and that 'lasso has long been in use in Texas,' &c. In other words, lasso was borrowed from Spanish at a time when z had the sound of s; and I observe, accordingly, that Minsheu's Span. Dict. (1613) gives the form laso as well as lazo. It certainly stands to reason that lasso ought to be Spanish, from its known use; but I did not understand how that was phonetically possible, and therefore supposed it must be from the cognate Port. lago.

LAST (1). (E.) Curiously enough, the particular phrase at last did not originate from the adj. last, but last is here a totally different word, and belongs to last (2). The phr. at last is due to A.S. on last, or on last. See the phr. on last = at last, in Gregory's Pas-toral Care, ed. Sweet, p. 21, 1. 10, and Mr. Sweet's note at p. 474, where he distinctly points out that at last has nothing to do with late. This suggests that Icel. & lesti, at last, stands for a leisti, leisti being dative of leistr.

LAST (2). In Wright's Vocab. i. 26, we find the A.S. glosses: 'Cernui, fot-leaste, læs-hosum; Caligarius, læst-weorhta [i.e. lastwright, last-maker]; Ocreæ, vel musticula, læste.' And again, at p. 181, the Low Lat. quitibiale is glossed by 'lest of a boote,' and formipedia by 'lest,' in the 14th century. LATH. E. Fries. latte, lat, a lath; F. latte, from O. Low G. The G. form is unmodified. The Teut. base is LAT - Aryan & RAD, to split; see root no. 297, p. 740. Thus the sense is 'that which is split off;' cf. Skt. rada, a splitting; also E. rodent and rat.

LATHER. 'Nitrum, leador ;' Wright's Voc. ii. 62, col. 1. LAVISH. Cf. 'Those, who did prodigally lavesse out and waste their substaunce or goodes vpon cokes' [cooks]; Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Diogenes, § 160. LAW. Though the form lagu occurs in A.S., the word is, practically, rather (Scand.) than (E.); as appears from the use and history of the word.

LAWN (2), a sort of fine linen. (F.) Lawn was certainly known in England earlier than A. D. 1562, the date given by Stow for its introduction. We already find 'Laune lynen, crespe' in Palsgrave (1530); and, as early as 1502, lawn is enumerated among the 'wares of Flanders, in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 205. It will be ob-served that the orig. name was not laune only, but also Laune lynen. Hence the very great probability that it took its name from Laon, the place of its manufacture. Laon, not far N. W. of Rheims, was spelt Lan at that period; see Calendar of State Papers, vi. 203, 224: and Ménage notes that it is pronounced Law (in French). Again, Baret says that lawn was also 'called cloth of Remes,' i. e. Rheims. At the present time, the principal manufactures of Laon are in woollen and worsted goods; but it may once have been otherwise. Cambray and Tournay are at no very great distance; see note on Cambric above. The Lat. name of the town is given as Lundunum or Lugdunum, where the termination -dunum is Celtic; see Down (2).

LAYER. I now suspect (and I find Dr. Stratmann is of the same opinion) that layer is nothing but another (and worse) spelling of lair. due to that confusion between lay and lie in popular speech which every one must have observed ; the spelling layere for 'lair' has been already noted, s.v. Lair. 1 therefore now propose to amend

LEAK. Cf. 'bæt Alece scip'=the leaky ship; Ælfred's tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, ed. Sweet, p. 437, l. 15. The initial h is remarkable, and prob. original.

LEAN (1). By the Swed. läna, I mean Swed. läna sig, to lean, given in Widegren (1788), and copied into the Tauchnitz Dict. The usual Swed. läna means to lend.' Cf. however, länstol, an easy chair, chair to lean back in.

LEASH. In the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2, we are told it is correct to say 'a Brace of grehoundis, of ij;' and 'a Lece of grehoundis, of iij."

LICTERN. The Anglo-F. lettron, a lectern, occurs in the Will of John of Gaunt; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 152. (The editor explains it, quite wrongly, by 'catafalque.') LEES. 'Put thereto lyes of swete wyne;' Arnold's Chron., 1502, ed. 1811, p. 189. Thus the word was at first spelt lyes [=lies], in strict accordance with its derivation from F. lies, pl. of lie.

LEFT. The etymology here given was derived from Mr. Sweet. See Anglia, vol. iii. p. 155 (1880), where the same account is given by him. He notes that lyf is an i stem = lupti\*, from the  $\sqrt{RUP}$ , to break; see Schmidt, Vocalismus, i. 159. From the same root we have lop and lib, as already pointed out. Certainly left is not derived from the pp. of the verb to leave, of which the usual M. E. form was laft.

LEMON. The pl. lemondis occurs as early as in Arnold's Chronicle, ed. 1811, p. 234 (ab. 1502). Limon-trees; Bacon, Essay 46. LETTUCE. Cf. Low Lat. letusa, glossed by M. E. letuse, Wright's Voc. i. 265, col. 2. This points to a Low Lat. lactucia *, as a derivative from lactuca. We find A.S. lactuca, borrowed immediately from Latin, in Exod. xii. 8.

LEVELE. So spelt also in Phillips (1706). But the English were certainly wrong in adopting this form ; the F. has only lever (infin.) in this sense. 'Le lever, le moment où le monarque reçoit dans sa chambre, après qu'il est levé; ' and ' Petit lever et grand lever du roi, dans l'étiquette de l'ancien régime; ' Littré. LEVERET. Cf. the Anglo-F. pl. leveres, hares, Gaimar's

LIEVY. Both the sb. and vb. occur rather early. 'That the [they] make levy of my dettys;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 43 (A. D. 1463). 'Aftyr the seyde money is levyed,' id. p. 49 (A.D. 1467). LEWD. The A. S. word should rather be written læwede. 'Laicus, læwede man;' Wright's Voc. i. 72, l. 8.

LICORICE. Anglo-F. Iycorys, Liber Albus, p. 224

LID. The A.S. Mid is directly derived from hlid-en, pp. of hlidan, to shut, cover, as already given.

LIEUTENANT. The pronunciation as leftenant is nothing new. The pl. lyeftenauntis occurs in Arnold's Chron., ab. 1502, ed. 1811, p. 120; and liefetenaunt in the Book of Noblesse, pr. in 1475, as quoted in the Catholicon Anglicum, p. 223, note 1. The

Anglo F. lieu-tenant, a deputy, occurs A.D. 1299, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 131

LIFEGUARD. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, still clings to the needless paradox of translating life by 'body.' As he cannot get the word out of the German, he suggests Swedish. But the Swed. word is lifuakt. Neither is it Dutch; for Sewel, in his Eng.-Du, Dict., gives 'Life-gard, een Lyfwacht.' The mod. Du. lijf garde proves nothing, as it may have been borrowed from E. Neither Swed. nor Du. freely combines Teut. words with F.; such combination is quite an E. peculiarity. LIGHTER, sb. Occurs in Cotgrave, s.v. gabarre.

LILAC. Bacon mentions 'the Lelacke Tree;' Essay 46. 'The Persian lilac was cultivated in England about 1638, the common lilac about 1597; 'Davies, Supp. Glossary. LIMP (2). Palsgrave has: 'lympe hault, boiteux.' If lympe-hault is here a compound word, it remarkably confirms the A.S. lemp-healt. The Icel. lempinn, lempiligr, means 'pliable, gentle.' There is perhaps some connection between this Icel. word and A.S. lemp-, but it is not easily traced. There is excellent authority for the A. S. word, for 'Lurdus, lemp-halt,' occurs in a gloss of the eighth century; in Wright's Voc. ii. 113, col. 1. I suppose lurdus = Gk.  $\lambda op\delta ds$ , stooping, bending forward, with reference to a decrepit gait.

LINNET. 'Carduelis, linet-wige;' Wright's Voc. ii. 13 (11th cent.). This explains the form linetwige as compounded of linet (from A.S. lin, L. linum, flax), and wige, a creature that moves quickly about, as if it were 'flax-hopper.' Perhaps our linnet is merely this word shortened. It makes little difference, since linnet is ultimately Latin. LISTEN. Cf. also Swed. lyssna, to listen ; prob. put for lysina *. On the other hand, we find Dan. lytte, to listen, prob. by assimilation from lyste *.

LITTER (2). 'Tho laye they down on a lytier made of strawe;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 27, ed. Arber, p. 61, I. 1. 'Leyde hym vpon a lyter of heye, id. c. 42; p. 116, l. 26. LITTER (3). Not (Scand.), but (F., -L.) We find 'a litter of welpis,' i. e. whelps, in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2. Really the same as litter (2). Wedgwood says: 'litter itself (F. littere) is used in the sense of bedding or resting-place, as: "the inn Where he and his horse littered" [rested]; Habington, Castara, pt. ii., to Mr. E. C., l. 24. From hence the sense of a brood of young may arise by a metaphor similar to that seen in F. accoucher, or in the E. expressions of being brought to bed or being in the straw.' So in the Prompt. Parv., we have 'lytere, or strowynge of horse,' and 'lytere, or forthe-brynggynge of beestys.' I was misled by Cleasby's Icel. Dict., where latr is equated to E. litter, whereas the sense of it is rather 'lair'; whilst láirask is to prepare or seek a lair, to go to rest (not 'to litter,' as it is explained to be). (The Icel. látr and F. litière are both ultimately from the same root.)

LIVELONG. Palsgrave has: 'All the lyflonge day, tout au long du jour, or tout du long de la journee; ' reprint, p. 853, col. 2. LO, interj. Mr. Sweet remarks: Lo cannot come from O. E.

[A.S.] lá, because of the rime lo : do in the Cursor Mundi [1, 14976]. The form low in the oldest text of the Ancren Riwle [no reference, but lo occurs at p. 52, l. 21, and low in St. Katharine, I. 849] points to an O.E. low * or log *, which latter may be a variation of loc, which occurs in the Chronicle, 'hi ferdon loc hu hi woldon,' an. 1009, Laud MS., ed. Earle, p. 142, where the other MSS. have loca, the imperative of locian, to look .- Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881. LOACH. We find lochefisch in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 355, an. 1357. Littré cites no authority for F. locke earlier than the 13th century. Cf. Ital. locca, locchia, 'a cob or gudgeon fish;' Florio. LOAN. The A. S. form lán occurs in lán-land, lit. loan-land, usually lan-land, in Cod. Dipl. ed. Kemble, iii. 165, l. 5.

LOATHSOME. Mr. Sweet remarks : the O. E. [A. S.] list has simply the meaning of hostility, and there does not appear to be any such word as laosum. Loath ome was probably formed from wlatsum, by substitution of the familiar ldo- for wlat.—Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881. This is probable enough; since M.E. wlatsom went out of use, though occurring in Chaucer, C. T., Group B, 3814; whilst loathsome does not occur, according to Stratmann, earlier than in the Promptorium Parvulorum, A.D. 1440. At the same time, I have already remarked that the A.S. llolic = E. loathly; and I may add that Stratmann gives 15 references for M. E. lablic, which had as nearly as possible the same sense as our loathsome. Cf. Lothsum, idem quod lothly; Prompt. Parv. Hence the argument from the original sense of A.S. 160 is really of no force.

LOBSTER. The etymology given is strongly corroborated by the 8th century A.S. gloss: 'Locusta, logust;' Wright's Vocab. ii. 113, col. 1. Here lopust is manifestly a mere attempt

LOCKRAM. 'A new rayle [night-drcss] and a lockerom kercher; 'Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 147 (A.D. 1556). LOITER. Dele sect.  $\beta$  to end of article. Cf. E. Fricsic loteren, lotern, to loiter, discussed by Koolman at p. 534. He suggests that the apparent base LUT is merely formed by 'gradation' from a base LAT, and that the real connection is with Late, q. v. Wedg. wood well compares Icel. lötra, to loiter (already noticed by me in

LOO. 'Pam in lanteraloo;' Farquhar, Sir Harry Wildair, ii. 2 (1701). This shews the full form. (1701).

LOOM (2). Perhaps (F, -L), rather than Scand. The M. E. lumen, to shine, answers still better to F. lumer, 'to shine, to give light, yield or cast a light;' Cotgrave (who adds the example la chandelle lume mal, the candle buins dimly). Sigart gives the Walloon lumer de z'eu, to hold eggs up to the light, to test them. The F. lumer is now only preserved in the comp. allumer. - Lat. luminare, to illumine; whence F. lumer, short for lumner*; see allumer in Brachet, and cf. F. lumière from luminaria. - Lat. lumen, light; see Luminous. This brings us back, by a different road, to the same root as before.

LOOP. Palsgrave has: 'Loupe in a towne, wall, or castell, creneau; Loupe to holde a button, fermeau.'

\*LORIMER, a maker of horses' bits, spurs, &c. (F., - L.) Spelt lorimer, loriner, in Blount (1674) and in Phillips. Blount notes that lorimer occurs an. 1 Rich. II. cap. 12. Palsgrave has: 'Loremar, that maketh byttes, esperonnier.' And see Liber Albus, p. 736 of the orig. edition. The simple sb. lorem, a bit, occurs in the Cursor Mundi, 25464. Loriner is the better form, as it agrees with Anglo-F. lorein, a bit; see Liber Custumarum, p. 79.-O. F. lorimier, given by Roquefort; later form lormier, 'a maker of nailes, spurs, &c., a word most used for a spurrier;' Cot. Put for lorinier\*; cf. E. loriner above. - O. F. lorein, lorain, rein, bridle, bit; Roquefort. -Low Lat. lorenum. loranum, a rein, bit; Ducange. Extended from Lat. lorum, a thong, a rein; so that loranum meant 'that which belongs to the rein,' hence a bit.  $\beta$ . The Lat. lorum is supposed to stand for wlorum\* or walorum\*, as is probable from the corresponding Gk. «UAnpov, a rein (commonly used in the pl., like Lat. lora). - WAR, later WAL, to turn; cf. Lat. uol-uere, Gk. eix-eiv; so that lora = the instruments for turning horses. See lormier in Scheler; Littré cannot understand the m in this word, though Scheler clearly explains it as being substituted for n. Cf. F. etameur, a tinman, from etain, tin.

LOT. There seem to have been two distinct forms, viz. A.S. Mot and A. S. hlýte or hlýt; the Icel. hlutr was orig. hlautr. The forms hlyte and Mautr, together with G. loos and Goth. Mauts, are from a diphthongal base HLAUT, from the Teut. root HLUT.

LOUNGE. I should have said that I suppose lungis, once a common word with us, to have been mistaken for a pl. form (as if = loungers), whence the sing. lounger, and lastly the verb lounge, were evolved. It will be observed that loungers is the form in The Guardian, in 1713. A large number of false forms have arisen from similar mistakes about the 'number' of substantives. The evolution of the form tweezers (see Tweezers) is a still more striking instance.

LUKEWARM. Cf. Swed. dial. ly, tepid; the ordinary Swed. word is ljum. The Danish word is lunken, corresponding to Swed. dial. ljunken (Rietz).

LUNGE. The etymology is verified by comparing the Walloon alonge, sb., a stagger, movement made by a drunken man to recover his equilibrium (or, as we might say, a lunge). The same sb. means a piece put on to a table to lengthen it, showing the connection with

L. longus. See Sigart's Dict. LURCH (1). Lorcher = pilferer. 'Ye, but thorowe falce lor-chers;' Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 98 (a. D. 1528). LURCH (3). Palsgrave has: 'Lurcher, an exceeding eater, galiffre.' Also: 'I lurtche, as one dothe his felowes at meate with eatynge to hastyly, Je briffe.' LYE. 'Liza, leak;' Wright's Voc. ii. 52, col. 1.

MACAW. Spelt mockaw in Gay, The Toilette, l. 9; The Espousal, 1. 15.

MACE (2). Cf. Anglo-F. maces, spice, Liber Albus, p. 230.

MAD. Also M. E. med, Cursor Mundi, 24886. Note the following genadd, id. 72, col. 2. 'Amens, genadd,' id. 5, col. 2. 'Fatue, genadd,' id. 72, col. 2. 'Amens, genadd,' id. 5, col. 2. 'Vanus, genaeded; Vecors, genaad,' id. 123, col. 1 (8th century). Referred Бv to the AMI, to diminish.

Diez, p. 465. *MAIL (BLACK), a forced tribute. (F. - L.) Mail is a Scottish term for rent. Jamieson cites the phr. burrow-mailles, duties for the Acte of Ias I. c. 8 (A. D. 1424). payable within boroughs, from the Acts of Jas. I. c. 8 (A. D. 1434). Black-maill is mentioned in the Acts of Jas. VI. c. 21 (1567), and in the Acts of Elizabeth, an. 43, cap. 13, as a forced tribute paid to moss-troopers; see Jamieson and Blount. Spelman is right in supposing that it meant black rent or black money, a jocose allusion to tribute paid in cattle, &c., as distinct from rent paid in silver or white money; Blount shows that the term black money occurs m 9 Edw. III. cap. 4, and while money is not uncommon. Blount also cites the term tlack-rents. - F. maille, 'a French halfpenny;' Cot. O. Fr. maaille, meaille. - Low Lat. medalia; see Modal, of which ¶ Not from A. S. mil (E. mole); nor from this mail is a doublet. A S. mél (E. meal).

MAIM, M.E. y-maybeymed, pp. P. Plowman, B. xvii. 189 (foot-note). Cf. Anglo-F. mahaigner, Lai d'Havelok, l. 730; manaym, sb., Liber Albus, p. 281.

*MAINOUR. (F. - L.) In the phr. 'taken with the mainwar, or later, 'taken in the manner;' see I Hen. IV. ii. 4. 347. See note to Manner, p. 352. We find pris ov meinoure (where ov = F. aves), Stat. of the Realin, i. 30, an. 1275. Blount, in his Nomolexicoe, explains mainour as meaning 'the thing that a thief steals;' and 'to be taken with the mainour,' as 'with the thing stoln about him, flagrante delicto.' It is lit. ' with the manœuvre,' and therefore refers rather to the act than the thing; see Cotgrave, s. v. flagrant; E. Webbe, Travels, 1590, ed. Arber, p. 28. The Anglo F. meinoure, also mainoure (Stat. Realm, i. 161) answers to O. F. maineure (Littré). See Manceuvre.

MAJORDOMO. Puttenham, in his Art of Poesie, 1589, b. iii. c. 4 (ed. Arber, p. 158) notes that Maior-domo 'is borrowed of the Spaniard and Italian, and therefore new and not vsuall, but to them that are acquainted with the affaires of Court.' The Ital. is majordomo, but the E. word was more likely borrowed from Spanish, being in use at the court of Elizabeth, and perhaps of Mary. MALARIA. The reference to Debonair requires a word of comment, since the Ital. aria is there used in a very different sense. Under aria, Florio refers to aere; and he explains aere to mean 'the element aire, a countenance, a look, a cheere, an aspect. a presence or app[e]arance of a man or woman; also, a tune, a sound, a note or an ayre of musicke or any ditty.' This great range of meanings is very remarkable. MAIL (2). The full form pall-mall is not (F., -L.), as stated inadvertently, but (F., - Ital., -O. H. G. and L.); however, mall is (F., -L.). See N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 29, where Dr. Chance shews that it means, literally, 'mallet-ball' or 'mall-ball;' cf. E. foot-ball. Prob. so called to distinguish it from an earlier game of palla, or ball. It also appears that the Mall was a later name than Pall Mall. being a mere abbreviation. Paille-maille is mentioned as the name of a game as early as abt. 1641; see Eng. Garner, vi. 283. Waller speaks of the Mall in his poem On St. James's Park. (ar We may note that Weigand, s. v. Ball, derives Ital. palla from Gk. πάλλα, contrary to Diez and Scheler.

MAMMA. 'The babe shall now begin to tattle and call hir Mamma; ' Euphues and his Ephœbus, ed. Arber, p. 129 (A. D. 1579). MAMMOTH, 1. 17. The quotation is quite correctly made, but 'horns' should certainly be 'bones.' The Russian for a bone is koste.

*MANCHINEEL, a W. Indian tree. (Span.,-L.) · Nonchinelo-tree, a tree that grows wild in the woods of Jamaica, the fruit of which is as round as a ball;' Phillips, ed. 1706. [Mahn gives an Ital. form mancinello, but I cannot find it; it must be quite modern, and borrowed from Spanish; the name, like many W. Indian words, is certainly Spanish, not Italian.] - Span. monza-nillo, a little apple-tree; hence, the manchineel tree, from the applelike fruit; dimin. of Span. manzana, an apple, also a pommel. Cf. Span. manzanal, an orchard of apple-trees. - Lat. Matiana, fem of Matianus, adj.; we find Matiana mala, and Matiana poma, applied to certain kinds of apples. The adj. Matianus, Matian, is from Lat. Matius, the name of a Roman gens (White).

*MANCIPLE, a purveyor, esp. for a college. (F., -L) Not obsolete; still in use in Oxford and Cambridge. M E. manciple, Chaucer, C. T. 569. The l is an insertion, as in principle, syllable, participle. - O. F. mancipe, a slave (Roquefort). Cf. O. Ital mancipio. a slave, vassal, subject, captive, manciple, farmer, baily,' &c ; Florio - Lat. mancipium, a slave, orig. possession, property, lit. a taking in the hand; see Maine, Ancient Law, p. 317. Cf. Lat. mancipi-, crude form of manceps, a taker in hand. - Lat. man-, stem of man-us, the hand; cip-, weakened form of cap-, base of cap-ere, to & that it may be of Teut. origin, from G. mast, mast, feeding, fattentake. See Manual and Captive.

* MANDOLIN, a kind of guitar. (F., - Ital., - Gk.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. - F. mandoline, a mandolin. - Ital. mandolino, dimin. of mandola, a kind of guitar (there were several kinds). Mandola is a corruption of mandora (cf. F. mandore), and, again, this is for bandora = Ital. pandora. See further under Banjo. MANGLE (1). In Langtoft's Chron. i. 254, we find Anglo-F. makangle, with the sense of 'maimed.' This suggests that mangle may be from an O.F. mahangler, frequentative form of O.F. mahaigner, to maim. See Maim at p. 348, and note on Maim above.

*MANGROVE. (Hybrid; Malay and E.) 'A sort of trees called mangroves;' Eng. Garner, vii. 371 (ab. 1689). My belief is that the second syllable is nothing but the E. word grove, and has reference to the peculiar growth of the trees, which form a close thicket of some extent. Again, the tree is sometimes called the mangle; so that mangrow may well stand for mang-grove or 'grove of mangs or mangles.' The syllable mang is due to the Malay name for the tree, viz. manggi-manggi; see Pijnappel's Malay-Dutch Dict. p. 133. MANNA. The word man, what?, is not Hebrew, but Aramaic of late date.—A. L. M. This disposes of the former of the two explanations; but the latter is probable. See Gesenius, 8th ed. p. 478; Speaker's Comment. i. 321. MANTEL PIECE. The origin is also clearly shewn in Palsgrave, who gives: ' Mantyltre of a chymney, manteau dune cheminee.' MANUAL. M.E. manuel, in phr. 'sync manuell,' i.e. sign manual, A. D. 1428; in Earl. E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 83, l. 18. MARCESCENT. Prof. Postgate remarks that the fundamental meaning of marcescere is not so much "to begin to die" or "to decay" as "to become soft, flabby, squashy, to begin to rot," which is the sign of decay.' This agrees still more closely with Gk. μαλκός, which (as we learn from Hesychius) was the orig. form of μαλακός, soft. The orig. sense of μαλκός was 'beaten soft,' from the base MARK, to beat, pound, as already given. The same base accounts for Lat. marcus, a hammer; see March (2).

MARGRAVE. As to the etymology of G. graf, see the long note in Max Müller, Lect. on Language, ii. 281. On p. 284 we read, 'whatever its etymology,' says Waitz, no mean authority, 'the name of graf is certainly German.' My suggestion amounts to this, that the supposed Teutonic origin of graf seems to depend, in some measure, on the assumption that the G. graf and the A.S. geréfa are related words, an assumption which renders the whole question much more obscure, and is entirely unwarranted. In the A.S. gerefa, ge-is a mere prefix, whilst the German word appears to begin with gr. Kluge connects G. graf with Goth. ga-grefts, a decree (Luke ii. I).

MARTELLO TOWER. Sir G. C. Lewis, Letters, 1862, p. 412, states that the story goes that these towers were called torri da martello because the watchmen gave the alarm by causing a hammer to strike a bell. That this is the right account is rendered probable by the following passages in Ariosto's Orlando, kindly sent me by an American correspondent. 'E la campana martellando tocca Onde il soccorso vien subito al porto;' x 51. And again: 'Le campane si sentino a martello Di spezzi colpi e spaventosi tocche;' xiv. 100. The fact that there was also a tower at Mortella has, probably, nothing to do with the name. See quotations in Davies, Select Glossar

MARTEN. Spelt martron, Book of St. Albans, fol. e 1; and in Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 31, p. 79, l. 28. MARTINET. I find 'you martinet rogue' in Wycherley's Plain Dealer, iii. 1 (A. D. 1677).

MASK. I have shewn that mask ought rather to be masker, as Sir T. More spells it. Cf. 'the king his Master [Francis I.] woll come, . . and see your Grace [Henry VIII.] in Calais in maskyr;'

A.D. 1510; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 143. MASTIFF. Wedgwood objects that the O.F. mestif mentioned by Cotgrave, and cited at p. 357, above, is a totally different word, and has nothing to do with it. We must therefore distinguish be-tween M. E. mestyf, 'hounde,' given as a variant of massyf in the Prompt. Parv. and O. F. mestif in Cotgrave. [The latter is a variant of O.F. mestis, mod. F. métis, mongrel; Littré, s.v. métis, gives examples of both forms; we even find M. E. mastis, a mongrel, in the Cath. Anglicum. O. F. mestis corresponds to a Low Lat. type mistitius *, and mestif to mistivus *, both from mistum, supine of miscere, to mix.] The M.E. mastif answers to an O.F. type mastif *, which may be regarded as a variant of O. F. mastin, 'a mastive,' &c. as already given. As to the etymology of O. F. mastin (which occurs in Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 283), I have followed that given by Diez, and generally adopted. B. Wedgwood makes the suggestion, ing; cf. mastochs, a fatted ox, &cc.; mästen, to fatten, to cram. We find the following M.E. words in the Prompt. Parv., viz. 'mast-hog, mastid-swyne, maialis; mastyn beestys, sagino, impinguo; mestyf [per-haps for mestid] hogge or swyne, maialis.' Way notes (p. 334) that in the Craven dialect a great dog is still called a masty. Halliwell also gives masty, very large and big; and masty dog, mastiff, oc-curring in Hobson's Jests, p. 11, Du Bartas, p. 46. This would seem to suggest that the word mastiff is, after all, a native word, and, in fact, a corruption of masty, due to confusion with the O. F. mestif, a mongrel. Masty is a mere derivative of Mast (2), q. v.; and the sense must then have changed from that of 'fattened by mast' to fat, large, big. There is worse confusion in the absurd form 'meetyf hogge,' which Way notes as occurring in two MSS.; where a word formed from A.S. mastan, to fatten, is turned into a hybrid compound by the addition of the F. suffix -if (Lat. -ivus). But I am not convinced that Wedgwood is right in this.

MATE (1). We also find Low G. maat, a companion, O. Swed. mat, müt, a companion, comrade (Ihre).

MATTRESS. 'Lego eidem Roberto j. matras et j. par. blanketts;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 11 (A.D. 1441); also spelt matras A.D. 1424, in Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 56. MAUDLIN. The Heb. migdol is from the root gádal, to be great or high (Gesenius).

* MAUND, a basket. (E.) This word, now nearly obsolete, occurs as early as the 8th century, in the gloss: 'Qualus, mand; Wright's Voc. i. 118, col. 2. + Du. mand, a basket, hamper. + Prov. G. mand, mande, manne, a basket (Flügel); whence F. manne. Root obscure.

MEDLEY. Cf. Anglo-F. medlee, a combat, Life of Edw. Conf. p. 15, l. 5; medle, Langtoft, i. 300; meslee, Havelok, 1041.

MEMENTO. 'To have mynde [remembrance] on vs .. in his [the priest's] memento; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 18. 'Remem-brynge you in oure memento; Roy, Rede Me, p. 85. It was thus an ecclesiastical term, having reference to the remembrance of benefactors in the priest's saying of mass.

MENIVER. Cf. Anglo-F. meniver, Liber Albus, p. 283; Stat. of the Realm, i. 381, an. 1363. MESSENGER, Cf. Anglo F. messager, Polit. Songs, p. 243, an. 1307 ; messanger, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 210.

METROPOLIS, 1. 3. The statement 'except in modern popular usage' is objected to; I am quite ready to give it up. I believe I adopted the idea from an article in the Saturday Review, written in a very decisive tone. The original meaning is well known. And therof is metropolis called the chief citee, where the Archbishop of any prouince hath his see, and hath all the other diocesses of that prouince subject to him, as Caunterbury and Yorke here in Englande; ' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Diogenes, 5 110.

MIEN. Possibly (F., -C.), rather than (F., -Ital., -Lat.) Used by Waller, in 1. 4 of a poem entitled 'These Verses were writ in the Tasso of Her Royal Highness.' Wedgwood thinks that meane in Spenser, vi. 7. 39 cannot be the same word. Perhaps not; for Spenser frequently uses words amiss, and he may have meant it as short for demeane, i. e. demeanour; see F. Q. vi. 6. 18. Again, he objects that the Ital. mina was borrowed from French; for this he adduces the authority of Florio (i.e. in the edition of 1611; for the first edition of Florio omits the word). The F. mine is not known to be earlier than the 15th century. Wedgwood suggests a derivation from Bret. min, ' the face, visage, countenance of a man, snout of quadrupeds, beak of birds, point of land; where the wider acceptation of the Breton form makes it extremely improbable that it is borrowed from the French.' And he further compares W. mingam, wry-mouthed, mingamu, to make a grimace. minial, to move the lips, &c. If these, as appears, be of genuine Celtic origin, we may perhaps compare Lat. minari, to project, mina, projecting points, presumably from AMAN, to project, no. 261, p. 739. This leads us back to the same root as before, and it is just possible that the Ital. mena, conduct, may thus be remotely connected with mien. B. It will be found that Scheler refers mine directly to the same original as F. se mener, i.e. to the Low Lat. minare, from Lat. minari ; this makes the connection much closer, and would make the word to be (F., -L.). The difficulty of the word is admitted. The Prov. mena, manner, kind (see Bartsch), deserves consideration. If this Prov. mena = F. mine, the connection with se mener is established. MILDEW. 'Nectar, hunig, obde mildeaw;' Wright's Voc.

MILLINER. The derivation from Milan may be safely accepted. See examples in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. E.g. in the Dialogues printed at the end of Minsheu's Span. Dict. p. 13, a lady asking for the finest millinery is told that 'in this chest shall your worship s' the principallest that is, all is worke of Milan.' And again, 'great  $\stackrel{\leftrightarrow}{\oplus}$  \*MOULDY, musty, fusty. (Scand.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, ii. 4. Millan [thrives] by silk and all curious works;' Burton, Anat. of 134. iii. 2. 119. This is an extremely difficult word. It has probably Melancholy, p. 53 (16th edition). Milan = Ital. Milano, Lat. Mediolanum, a Celtic place-name; see Bacmeister, Kelt. Briefe, pp. 71, 102.

MINX. Also applied to a lap-dog or pet dog, in accordance with the derivation given. 'A little mynze [pet dog] ful of playe;'

Udall tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, 1542 (ed. 1877, p. 143). MISER. Cf. the following: 'Aristippus saied, Euen I it is, miserable and wretched creature that I am, and a more miser then I, the kyng of the Persians; ' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, the kying of the remains; Udail, it. of Erasinus Apophingmis, Aristippus, § 62. So also in the same, Diogenes, § 92. MIISTVE. King Edw. IV. employs the phr. 'our lettres mis-sines'; A. D. 1477. See Original Letters. ed. Ellis, i. 17. •MISTY (2). (F., -L, -Gk.) In the phrase 'mistiness of language,' we have a totally different idea. A man's language is misty when it is mystic or mysterious; and in this case, misty is a mere corruption of mystic. Accordingly, in the Prompt. Parv., we find a distinction made between 'mysty, nebulosus' and 'mysty, or prevey to mannes wytte, misticus.' So also mysty, mystic, in Wyclif, Eng. Works, ed. Matthew, p. 344; and mystily, mystically. in the same, p. 343. Cf. mistier, with the double meaning, in P. Plowman, B. x. 181. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology. For the loss of the final letter, cf. E jol'y from O. F. jolif.

MITTE (2). In Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 204, it is expressly said that a mite is a Dutch coin, and that 'viij mytis makith an Eng: d.;' i. e. a mite is half a farthing; cf. Mark xii. 42.

MIZEN. Palsgrave has: 'Meson sayle of a shyppe, mysayne.' MIZZLE. 'To miselle, to mysylle, pluuitare ;' also 'a mi:elynge, nimbus;' Catholicon Anglicum, p. 241. MOAT. The Romansch word muotta, a lower rounded hill, is interesting, as being still in very common use in the neighbourhood of Pontresina. It is the same word as F. motte.

MOIETY. Cf. Anglo-F. moyte, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 441; meyte, id. i. 219.

MOLE (2). M. E. mollis, pl., Book of St. Albans, fol. f 6, back. MONGREL. Spelt mengrell, Book of St. Albans, fol. f 4, back. This is still closer to A.S. meng-an.

* MOONSHEE, a secretary. (Arab.) 'A writer, a secretary; applied by Europeans usually to teachers or interpreters of Persian and Hindustani; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 3-6.-Arab. munshi, a writer, secretary, tutor, language-master; Rich.

Dict. p. 1508. MOOR (3). The pl. Moures occurs in Mandeville's Trav. p. 156. MORASS. Heylin, at the end of his Observations on the Hist. of the Reign of King Charles, published by H. L., Esq. [i. e. Hamon Lestrange, gives an Alphabetical Table containing the 'uncouth and unusual words which are found in our Author.' Among these is Morasse.

MORMONITE. Joseph Smith's own explanation was that Mormon = E. more + Egypt. mon, good ; i.e. 'more good'! See The Mormons (London, 1851).—A. L. M. This explanation was probably an afterthought; in the first instance, the word was unmeaning. MORRIS. To be marked as (Span., -L., -Gk.).

MORTUARY. Rather (F., - L.), than (L.). At any rate, we find Anglo-F. mortuarie, Year-Books of Edw. 1. ii. 443.

MOSLEM. Arab. muslim, a righteous man; lit. a participial form, 4th conj., from salama, to be tranquil, at rest, to have done one's duty, to have paid up, to be at perfect peace. It implies 'one who strives after righteousness.' See Deutsch, Literary Remains,

MOSQUITO. The Spaniards call them [the files] Musketas;

E. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 275 (ab. 1583). MOTET. This actually occurs as early as in Wyclif, English Works, ed. Matthew (E. E. T. S.), p. 91, l. 4 from bottom. MOTH. The G. motte is not a true High-G. word, but merely borrowed from Low German. See Weigand; who also denies the connection between A.S. mobbe and A.S. mabu. If there be no connection, we may still refer ma-du to the Teut. base MA, to mow, as already said; cf. Fick, iii, 224. And perhaps A. S. moode, also spelt mohoa, may be allied to Skt. makshika, a fly (by equating A.S. moh- = mah- to Škt. mak-).

MOULD(1), 1, 9. The adj. mould y is only related to mould, crumbling earth, when used with direct reference to such mould, which is very seldom the case. The word mouldy, as commonly used, is a different word altogether. See Mouldy (below). *MOULD (3), rust, spot. (E.) Perhaps only in the compound iron-mould. Here mould is a mere corruption of mole, a spot; the added d was prob. due to confusion with moled, i. e. spotted 'One droppe of poyson infecteth the whole tunne of Wine; . . one yron 'e whole peece of Lawne ;' Lyly, Euphnes, ed. Arber,

been confused with mould (1), supposed to mean dirt, though it properly means only friable earth. It has also probably been coe fused with mould (3), rust, spot of rust. But with neither of these words has it anything to do. It is formed from the sb. mould, fustiness, which is quite an unoriginal word, as will appear. For an example of this sb., compare: 'we see that cloth and apparel, not aired, doe breed moathes and mould;' Bacon, Nat. Hist [ 34]. This sh. is due to the M.E. verb monlen, to become mouldy, to putrefy or rot, as in: 'Let us not moulen thus in idlenesse;' Chauce, C. T. Group B. 1. 32. The pp. mouled was used in the precise sense of the mod. E. mouldy, and it is easy to see that the sb. was really due to this pp., and in its turn produced the adj. mouldy. Strai-mann cites 'pi mouled mete,' i.e. thy mouldy meat, Political Poems, &c., ed. Furnivall, p. 181; moulid bred, i.e. mouldy bread, Reliquize Antiquze, i. 85; 'Pannes mouled in a wiche,' clothes lying mouldy in a chest; Test. of Love, b. ii., in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 296, col. 1. So also mowled, mowlde, mucidus; from mowle, mucidare, Catholicon Anglicum, q.v. Todd cites: 'Sour wine, and mowled bread;' Abp. Cranmer, Ans. to Bp. Gardiner, p. 290. With which compare: 'Very coarse, hoary, moulded bread,' Knollys, Hist. of the Turks (Todd).  $\beta$ . The oldest spelling of the M. E. verb is musulen. 'Oder leten pinges musulen oder rusten' = or let things grow mouldy or rusty; Ancren Riwle, p. 344, l. 4. We also find "mulede pinges' = mouldy things, id. p. 104, note A. - Icel. mygia, to grow musty. Formed, by vowel-change of u to y, from Icel mugga, mugginess. See Muggy. Thus mould is mugginess; the notions of muggy and mouldy are still not far apart. Cf. also Swed. mögla, to grow mouldy, mögel, mouldiness or mould; moglig, mouldy. Der. mouldi-ness; also mould, verb, put for moul, Spenser,

F. Q. ii. 3. 41. See note on Mould (1) above. MOUTH. To the cognate forms add G. mund. MULLET (2). Cf. molettys, pl., Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. (0f Arms). fol. b 3, back ; molet, sing., id. fol. f 7, back. Anglo-F. molet, a mullet (in heraldry), A.D. 1399; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 181. MUMMY. 'Take Momyan, oderwise called momya among Poticarics;' Book of St. Albans, fol. c 3. This preserves the final a of Pers. múmáyin.

MUSCLE (2). The A.S. form muscule, apparently used as a plural, occurs very early, viz. in Ælfred, tr. of Beda, bk. i. c. i. 'Conchá, musclan, scille;' Mone, Quellen, p. 340.

MUSE (1). There are difficulties about this word. I give the solution proposed by Diez, which seems to me the best. Indeed, I find, that the word muse proves to have been in actual use as a term of the chase, precisely as I conjectured. And any hounde fynd or musyng of hir mace Ther as she hath byne,' i. e. if any hound find, or makes a scenting of her [the hare] where that she hath been; Book of St. Albans, fol. e 6. Here musyng = a sniffing, scenting. See musart, muse, musel, muser, in Bartsch (Chrestomathie Française).

MUTE (2). 'Yowre hawke mutessith or mutith;' Book of St.

Albans, fol. a 6, back. MUTTON. If we reject the Celtic origin, we may fall back upon the explanation given by Diez. The Celtic words may all have been borrowed from Low Latin, and they cannot be satisfactorily explained as Celtic. See Ducange, s. v. castrones, who has:

oves, moliones, castrones, vel agnellos. (A. L. Mayhew.) MYSTERY (2). Cf. Anglo-F. mister, a trade, Langtoft's Chron. i. 124; Stat. of the Realm, i. 311, an. 1351.

NAG. Owing to the derivation from Du. negge, we actually find the spelling neg, in North's Life of Lord Guildford, ed. 1808, i. 171 (Davies).

NAKED. The verb nacian or ge-nacian occurs in the Old Northumbrian gloss of Mark ii. 4, where Lat, nudauerunt is glossed by ge-nacedon.

NARD. Rather  $(F_{.,} - L_{.,} - Gk_{.,} - Heb_{.,} - Pers_{.,} - Skt_{.})$  The Gk vapoos may have been borrowed from Heb. nerd, nard ; the Heb. word being from the Persian, and that from the Skt.

NEAP. Cf. also Swed. knapp, scanty, scarce, narrow, sparing; knappa, to pinch, stint. NEGRO. It is suggested that this is from Port. negro, black, not from Span. negro, black. It is surely very hard to decide, and cannot greatly matter. For my own part, I think Shakespeare and his contemporaries had it from Spanish.

NEPHEW. Cf. Anglo-F. nefu, Langtoft's Chron. i. 402; nove, Vie de St. Auban, l. 1328. NESH. The A.S. nom. is Anesce rather than Anesc. (T. N. Toller.)

NIGHTMARE. We also find Pol. mara, mora, nightmare, Bohem. mura, Russ. kiki-mora, phantom. Cf. also Skt. mara, death, killing, obstruction; from the same root.

pares with O. H. G. naktscato, though the latter was only used in the sense of 'shadow of night.' The Du. is nachtschade, which Wedgwood inadvertently gives as the G. form. He probably means that one name for 'nightshade' in Swed. dialects is nattskate-gräs, which seems to be named from Swed. dial. nattskata, a bat ; and that this last word is cognate with G. machtschade, a night-jar, night-raven. This gives to natiskate-gras the sense of 'night-jar-grass,' but does not at all explain E. nightshade, Du. nachtschade, G. nachtschatten, in which the second syllable is certainly 'shade.' It seems simpler to confess our ignorance of the reason for which this name was given.

NINEPINS. Ben Jonson speaks of 'nine-pins or keils;' Chloridia, The Antimasque. NIT. The A.S. Anitan is also used in the sense to dash or strike, as in speaking of the collision of armed hosts; see Grein.

NITRE. Cf. Gk. virpov, soda; prob. from a Semitic source; cf. Heb. nether, Prov. xxv. 20, Jer. ii. 22; see Septuagint and Vulgate. -A. L. M.

NOCTURN. The Lat. nocturnus may also be divided as noct-urnus; cf. di-ur-nus. Roby divides it as noctu-rnus, from noctu, by night, but enters it under the suffix -ur-no-. My division as noc-tur-nus = Gk. vun-rep-avos, is that given by Vaniček.

NODDLE. The word knod, though not occurring in M.E., occurs in the Kentish nod, the nape of the neck (Kennet, 1695, E. D. S.); Sussex nod, the same. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology.

NONAGE. Orig. a law-term; Anglo-F. nonage, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 151.

*NONCHALANT, careless. (F., -L.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. - F. nonchalant, 'careless,' Cot.; pres. pt. of O F. nonchaloir, 'to neglect, or be carelesse of;' Cot. - F. non, not; chaloir, 'to care, take thought for;' id. Cf. O.F. chaloir, caloir, in Bartsch; also Anglo-F. nunchaler, to be careless, Life of Edw Conf. 4519. - Lat. non, not; calere, to glow, be animated. See Caldron. Der. nonchalance, sb., from F. nonchalance, carelessness, indifference. NOOSE. To be marked as  $(F_{..}-L_{.})$ . Certainly from O. F. now, mod. F. nowd (Lat. nodus), a knot. The difficulty is to account for the final s. Perhaps = O. F. nows, preserved as a nom. case equivalent to Lat. nodus (cf. fils = filius); or perhaps = O. F. nous, nom. pl.

Hardly from the adj. noneux, knotty. NOSEGAY. The use of gay in the sense of a gay or showy object occurs in a quotation from N. Breton, ed. Grosart, given by Davies in his Supp. Glossary. Breton says: 'And though perhaps most commonly each youth Is given in deede to follow every gaye;' Toys of an Idle Head, p. 28.

NOZZLE. Cf. 'Ansa, nostle,' Wright's Voc. ii. 6 (11th cent.). This looks like the same word.

NUZZLE. So also Swed. nora, to smell to, to snuff; nosa pd all ting, to thrust one's nose into every corner (Widegren).

NULL. Perhaps (F., -L.) rather than L.; for it may have come in as a law-term. Cf. Anglo F. nulle, Stat. of the Realm, i. 334. an. 1353; nul, Vie de St. Auban, l. 573. Cf. 'null and void.' NUNCHEON. The statement that nuncheon was turned into the modern luncheon is needless, and unsupported. The words are quite distinct, as is rightly stated, s.v. Luncheon, at p. 345.

OAKUM. That the orig. sense of A. S. dcumba was ' that which is combed away,' appears from the fact that it occurs as a gloss to L. putamen, i. e. that which is cut away; Mone, Quellen, p. 407. OBIT. M. E. obite, A.D. 1447; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 285;

Anglo-F. obit, A.D. 1381; id. p. 98.

OBSEQUIES. Anglo F. obsequies, pl., Liber Custumarum, p. 225. OBSTACLE. For the suffix -culo, see Roby, 3rd ed. pt. 1, § 862. 2 (c) 2. So also in Oracle, Receptacle.

*ODALISQUE, a female slave in a Turkish harem. (F., - Turk.) 'Sleek odalisques ;' Tennyson, Princess, ii. 63. - F. odalisque, the same (Littré); better spelt odalique (Devic). - Turk. odaliq, a chambermaid - Turk. oda, a chamber, a room ; Zenker's Dict. p. 115

OGLE. The verb to ogle is used by Dryden, Prol. to the Prophetess, l. 45; the sb. occurs in The Spectator, no. 46. 'The city neither like us nor our wit, They say their wives learn ogling in the pit; T. Shadwell, Tegue o Divelly, Epilogue, p. 80 (1691). A sidenote says : 'A foolish word among the canters for glancing.' It is thus one of the cant words introduced from Holland.

OMBRE. Mentioned in Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iv. 2 (1677). ONE (1). Spelt wow in 1536 by Sir W. Kyngston; and both wow and woon by Hen. VIII. himself in 1544; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 59, 130. Spelt wone in Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 117 (1528). Roy even has wother for other; p. 60, l. 17.

ONION. Anglo-F. oynoun, Liber Albus, p. 238. ONYX. The M. E. form onicke, occurring in Mandeville's Travels, p. 219, is taken from French. It is spelt onycke in Cotgrave.

NICHTSHADE. The G. is nachtschatten, which Weigand com- OOZE. Cf. 'oes or mire;' E. Webbe, Travels (1500), ed. Arber. p. 32. The initial w is preserved in the Northants, weez or wooz, to ooze (Miss Baker). She gives an example of weez as a verb, to ooze out, answering to an A. S. wesan* formed from wos by vowel change of o to e.

ORAL, 1. 5. Instead of AN, Vaniček refers us to AS, to breathe, to be, whence also E. is. But see Fick, i. 486. ORANGE. M.E. orenge, Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 1044; oronge, Prompt. Parv. (see Way's note). Cf. Skt. náraňga, an orangetree.

ORANG-OUTANG. 'An oran-outang o'er his shoulders hung :' Garth, Dispensary, c. v. l. 150 (ab. 1696).

ORE. The etymology of A.S. or is difficult, but it is probably only a variant of ar, copper, brass. Both the A.S. ar and Lat. as were used vaguely; Lewis and Short give, as the first sense of as, 'any crude metal dug out of the earth.' Fick ranges A.S. ár under the Teut. form AISA (iii. 5); and Lat. as under the Aryan form AYAS (i. 507). ¶ Wedgwood regards ore as a contraction of the Teut. word seen in G. ader, a vein; but the A.S. word for vein was dedre, dedr, a fem. sb., distinct from or, ore, and ora, a coin (of a certain value); or, like ar, was prob. neuter. Surely or and dedre are a long way apart, and I wholly dissent from such a notion.

*ORGULOUS, proud. (F., -O.H.G.) The reading in modern editions for orgillous, Shak. Troil. prol. 2 Palsgrave has: 'Orguyllous, prowde, orguislleux.' M.E. orgeilus, O.E. Misc. p. 30, l. 23; cf. Sir T. Malory, Morte Arthure, bk. xxi. c. 1. Anglo F. orguyllus, Langtof's Chron. i. 54. – O.F. orguillus (11th cent.), later orguiulus, Langtoit s Chron. i. 54. – O.F. orguillus (11th cent.), later orguilleus, 'proud,' Cot. – O.F. orguil, orguel, orgoil, mod. F. orgueil, 'pride,' id. [Cf. Span. orguilo, orig. wrgwilo, as shewn by l. 1947 of the Poem of the Cid, Ital. orgoglio, pride.] From a supposed O.H.G. sb. urguoli*, pride; formed from O.H.G. urguol, remarkable, notable (Graff, iv. 153). See Diez, Scheler, Littré. Scheler further cites O.H.G. urgilo, proud (without a reference); Wackernagel has urguil, an old boar, which is thought to be glocally moleted. (Cf. A.S. arguilieus argomethy. which is thought to be closely related. Cf. A.S. or gelike, arrogantly, in Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. 18, § 4. B. The O.H.G. word is com-pound; the prefix ur-answers to A.S. or-, Goth. us, out, and has an intensive force, as explained under Ordeal. y. The latter part of the word is not clear; the vowel shews that it is hardly related to A.S. gal, luxury, or to G. geil, rank. It is rather to be connected with the E. verb to yell, A.S. gellan (pt. t. geall, pl. gullon, pp. gol'en), in connection with which Fick cites O. Norse gollir, with resounding voice. See Fick, iii. 105; and see Yell. Cf. also G. gaul, a stallion, M. H. G. guil, a boar, a word of obscure origin.

ORISON. I have received the following criticism. 'Treat -tio as tor; there is no need of interposing the passive participle, which contributes nothing to the sense.' My reason for mentioning the passive participle is that it is better known than the supine, and for all practical purposes does just as well. I think there is certainly a need to mention the [form of the] passive participle, as it contributes something to the form. Thus Roby, in his Lat. Grammar, 3rd ed. pt. i. § 854, well explains the suffix -tion- as helping to form 'abstract feminine substantives formed from supine stems,' and instances accusat-io (from accus-at-um, supine). This is precisely what I intend. and I am convinced that it is right.

ORRERY. 'And makes a universe an orrery;' Young. Night Thoughts, Night 9. The barony of Orrery derives its name from the people called Orbraighe, descendants of Orb; see Cormac's Glossary, ed. Stokes, 1868, p. 128. (A. L. Mayhew.)

ORRIS. Spelt yress, A. Borde, Introd. of Knowledge, ed. Furni-vall. p. 94, 1. 24: p. 288, 1. 19 (ab. 1542). OUCH, NOUCH. Cf. Anglo-F. nouche, Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363; nusche, Vie de St. Auban. I. 20.

OUNCE (2). I find, in Cotgrave, lonce, ' the ounce, a ravenous This gives early beast;' also once, ' the spotted ounce, or lynx.' examples of the E, word, and shews that the F, had both lonce and once.

OUST. Anglo-F. ouster, Year Books of Edw. I. i. 113; Stat. of the Realm. i. 159, an. 1311. OUTLINE 'The painters, by the virtue of their outlines, colours, lights, and shadows,'&c. ; Dryden, Parallel bet. Painting and Poetry, 1694 (repr. 1882, p. 139). This is the passage which Todd cites. OWN (3). Add: Swed. unna, to grant, allow, admit.

OYER. Cf. Anglo-F. oier et terminer, to hear and determine, Stat. of the Realm, i. 44, an. 1276; Anglo-F. oyer, a hearing (v infin. as sb.), Year-Books of Edw. I. 4. 73.

OYEZ. Anglo-F. oyez, Stat. of the Realm, i. 211 (ab. A. D. 1286). DEssays, 1881, i. 130. See also pairidaeza in Justi, Handbach der by a messenger in the Cov. Mysteries, p. 94. OYSTER. Anglo F. oyster, Liber Albus, p. 244.

PACK. Perhaps not (C.), but (L.). This can hardly be of ultimate Celtic origin, as the initial Aryan p is lost in the Old Celtic languages. In Teutonic, p is also extremely scarce as an initial letter. Hence, we are led to suppose that the word is really of Latin origin, although the Low Lat. paccus is not found early. The APAK, to fasten, is, however, well represented in Latin, and it seems reasonable to refer the word to this root.

*PADDY, rice in the husk. (Malay., - Skt.) Malay. padi, rice in the husk ; the same as Karnáta (Canarese) bhatta, bhuttu, 'rice in the husk; commonly called by Europeans in the S. of India batty, in the N. paddy, both derived apparently from this term, which again is derived from the Skt. bhakta, properly, not raw, but boiled rice; 'H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, pp. 79 and 386. – Skt. bhakta, food, boiled rice; orig. pp. of bhaj, to divide, take, possess (Benfey). PADLOCK. The word occurs much earlier. Florio (ed. 1598)

PAGEANT. In the Cov. Mysteries, p. 1, we find: 'In the flyrst pagent, we thenke to play How God dede make, '&c. Here the 'first pagent' is the first scene. The Lat. pagina occurs in the Gloss. to Liber Albus, iii. 470, where the editor suspects it to be wrong (though it is quite right), but afterwards compares it with the form pegma, of Gk. origin. An important example of M. E. pagyn (without the added t) occurs in Wyclif's Works, ed. Arnold, i. 120, l. 5; 'And bes pagys playen bei' = and this pageant they play. PAGODA. 'They have their idols... which they call Pagodes;'

Hackluyt, Voiages, 1599, ii. 253. The allusion is to the people of Beejapoor, not far to the E. of the Portuguese settlement of Goa.

PALATE. We also find M.E. palase, the palate, Cath. Angl. p. 396, s. v. tunge. This is precisely F. palais.

p. 396, s. v. tunge. This is precisely F. palais. PALFREY. With Low Lat. usredus cf. W. gorwydd, a horse; Rhýs, Celtic Britain, p. 295.

PALL (2), to become vapid. Not (C.), but (F., -L.). This account requires much correction; see note on Appal above. Palsgrave is right. Either pall is from O. F. paslir, pallir (F. pâlir), to grow wan or pale; or it is a shortened form of appal, which is from the same source with the mere addition of the prefix a- (Lat. ad).

PALLET (1). Anglo-F. paillete, straw, Bestiary, l. 451. PALTRY. Cf. G. spalten, to split. PAMPHLET. A curious instance of Low Lat. panfletus occurs: • Revera libros non libras maluimus, codicesque plusquam florenos, ac panfletos exiguos incrassatis prætulimus palfridis;' Rich. de Bury, Philobiblon, c. 8. The E. pauriflet occurs in the last paragraph of a Treatise on Fishing (1496). *PANNAGE, food of swine in woods; money paid for such food. (F., -L.) Obsolete; see Blount's Nomo-Lexicon, Todd's Johnson, &c. Also spelt paumage, and even poumage ; see Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, ed. Morris, p. 180, l. 7. Anglo-F. panage, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 63, ii. 135. - O. F. passage, 'pawnage, mastage, monie . . . for feed-ing of swine with mast;' Cot. From a Low Lat. type pastionaticum*, pannage. Ducange gives the corrupted form pasnadium, and also the verb pastionare, to feed on mast, as swine. - Lat. pastionstem of pastio, a grazing, used in Low Lat. with the sense of right of pannage. - Lat. past-um, supine of pascere, to feed; see Pastor. PANT. Cf. that made my heart so panck ever since, as they say;' Dryden, Wild Gallant, Act v. sc. 3. A hawk was said 'to pante,' when short-winded ; Book of St. Albans, fol. b6, back. We may perhaps compare pank with spank, q. v. PANTALOON. Alban Butler (Lives of Saints) gives St. Pantaleon's death under the date July 27, A.D. 303. Sir H. Nicolas gives his day as July 28. Called in the Gk. church St. Panteleemon.

PANTHER. Not (F., -L., -Gk.), but (F., -L., -Gk., -Skt.). The Gk. waron was almost certainly borrowed from Skt. pundarika, a tiger; and then altered so as to give it an apparent Gk. form. The Skt. word is not given by Benfey with this meaning in his Dictionary, but he cites it elsewhere, and the word is well authenticated ; see the St. Petersburg Skt. Dict., and Curtius, ii. 28.

PARADISE. It is now known that the Gk. mapádecoos is borrowed from the Zend or Old Persian pairidaéza, an enclosure, a place we'' "ers. pairi, around; and diz, to mould or form, "The root in Skt. is DIH or DHIH (for cogna' eans to knead, squeeze together, shape; roixos, a wall; Max Müller, Selected Skt. whe

See above. We even find the imp. sing. oy ! used as an exclamation Zendsprache. See & DHIGH, no. 168, at p. 736. If E. dike, as is probable, is cognate with Gk. roivos, then paradise is (to coin a hybrid word) a 'peridike,' orig. an enclosure surrounded with a mad wall. See The Academy, Feb. 28, 1883, p. 140. PARAMOUNT. The following are examples of Anglo-F. paramont. 'Et paramont la tombe,' and above the tomb: 'paramont' les estallez,' above the choir-stalls ; Will of Edw. Black Prince (1376); Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, pp. 67, 70. We also find it as an adv., spelt paramount, with the sense 'more'; Liber Albus, p. 390.

PARASITE. It should be noted that the invidious sense of the word is unoriginal. The word is of religious origin, and had reference to a class of priests who (probably) had their meals in common. See Liddell and Scott; also Plutarch, Solon, 24.

PARCH. Delete the first section. I have now no doubt that this word is  $(F_{n} - L_{n})$ , being merely a doublet of pierce. In the first place, we often find M. E. perchen, to pierce; of this I have already given two examples, to which add: 'A crown of thorn xal perchy [shall pierce] myn brayn,' Coventry Mysteries, p. 238; also 'perchy myne herte,' Religious Pieces, ed. Perry, E. E. T. S. p. 85, 1.65; and see perche, to thirle, in Cath. Angl. p. 276, note 4. Next, the change from perch to parch is perfectly regular and common; cf. dark from M. E. derk, sark from M. E. serk, parson from M. E. persone, &c. Lastly, the change of sense is due to the metaphor 'to pierce with cold,' of which ' to parch with heat' is the correlative. Cf. Cleveland peerching, piercing, said of cold or a cold wind (Atkinson); to period (i.e. pierce) with cold, common in many dialects, from M. E. perishes, variant of percen, to pierce, as in P. Plowman, B. xvii. 189 (footnote). Cf. also Milton's lines: 'The farching air Burns frore;' P. L. ii. 594. Also 'Pearching, cold, penetrating, pinching;' R. B. Peacock, Lou-dale Glossary. 'It's a pearchin' cold wind, this!' W. Dickinson, Cumberland Glossary (E. D. S.). Parced (= pierced) occurs in Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 145. And observe that percher, to pierce, is the Walloon form of F. percer; see Sigart.

PARD. Cf. also Skt. pridáku, a leopard (Benfey).

*PARIAH, an outcast. (Tamil.) Spelt paria in the story called The Indian Cottage, where it occurs frequently. From Tamil paraiyan, commonly, but corruptly, pariak, Malayalim parayan, a man of a low caste, performing the lowest menial services; one of his duties is to beat the village drum (called parai in Tamil), whence, no doubt, the generic appellation of the caste ;' H. H. Wilson, Glossary of Indian Terms, p. 401. PARLIAMENT. Anglo F. parlement, Stat. of the Realm, i. 26, A. D. 1275. We find Lat. parlamentum in Matt. Paris, p. 696, under the date 1246, and parliamentum, in Matt. Westminster, p. 352, under the date 1253; see Stubbs, Select Charters, pt. vi. PARSON. Cf. Selden's Table-Talk, s. v. Parson.

PARTAKE. We also find partetaker in Roy, Rede Me, ed.

Arber, p. 85 (A.D. 1528). PARTICIPLE. M. E. participyl (15th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. ii. 14. PARTNER. Anglo F. partenere, partenere, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 155; parcener, id. 45. See Coparcener above, p. 795. PATE. Not (F., -G.), but (F., -G., -Gk.). PATOIS. Occurs in Smollett, France and Italy, Letter xxi

PAW. Not (C.), but prob. (F., -Low G.?). The W. and Corn. forms are, however, borrowed from English, and the Bret. form from O. French; see Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 209. The E. word is, then, from O. F. pos, a paw, also found as poie (see above reference), which is the same word as Prov. pouto, a paw, Catalan poia (Diez, s. v. poe, p. 659). = Low G. pote, a paw; cf. Du. poot, G. pfote (from Low G.). These words seem to be further allied to Span. pata, a paw, F. patte; but the nature of the relationship is not clear. Weigand derives the G. words from the F. patte. Scheler supposes them to be from a common imitative root, seen also in Gk. mareiv ; see Patrol, Path.

*PAWNEE, drink; as in brandy pawnee, Thackeray, Newcomes, ch. i. (Hind., - Skt.) Hind. pání, water (also in Bengáli, and other dialects); Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 397. - Skt. pántya (Wilson), allied to pána, drinking, beverage (Benfey). - Skt. pá, to drink; cf. E. potation.

PAV (2). If we could find any early use of this word, I would rather derive it from French. There was an O. F. poier, to pitch, found in the 13th century; see Littré, s. v. poisser. The corresponding Norman (Anglo-F.) form would have been peier, whence E. would result ; cf. Anglo-F. lei, law, fei, faith (F. loi, foi). The O.F. poier is from Lat. picare, just as before.

PAYNIM. Cf. Anglo-F. paenime, heathen lands; Life of Edw.

Conf. 1. 336. PEA. The dat. pl. pisum occurs in the Old Northumb. gloss. of Luke xv. 16,

PEA-JACKET, last line but one. Still, the W. pais can naraly factorew for trans. One cannot be a related word. Prof. Rhy's derives W. pais, formerly peis, from Lat. pexa, i. e. pexa nestis or pexa tunica. The Lat. pexus, combed, but the results or pexa tunica. The Lat. pexus, combed, but the results or pexa tunica. The case of the results of meetere to comb. PEA-JACKET, last line but one. Still, the W. pais can hardly Hebrew) Periskin. See Smith's Bible Dict.; Gesenius, 8th ed., s. v.

PEAL. 'Of the swete pele and melodye of bellys;' Monk of Eveshan, c. lvii; ed. Arber. PEAT. Gervase Markham calls the burning of weeds or furze to manure the ground a 'burning of Baite;' Farewell to Husbandry, 1649, p. 21. PECK (2). Cf. Anglo-F. peck, a measure, Stat. of the Realm, i.

321, an. 1352; pek, Liber Albus, p. 335. PEDIGREE. The spelling petit degree occurs in Stanyhurst, tr.

of Æneid, ed. Arber, p. 14, l. 14; but this is probably a form of Stanyhurst's own, and proves nothing; for he also writes pettegrye, p. 30, l. 2. *PERL (4), a small castle. (F., -L.) Used by Burns, The Five Carlins, st. 5; see Jamieson. M. E. pel (also pele, pell), Chaucer, (iii 220): peill, pl. pelis, Barbour, Bruce, 10. Ho. of Fame, I. 1310 (iii. 220); peill, pl. pelis, Barbour, Bruce, 10. 137, 147. The same word as M. E. pile, P. Plowman, C. xxii. 366; 137, 147. The same word as M. É. pile, P. Plowman, C. xxii. 366; cf. I dwelle in my pile of ston, Torrent of Portugal, ed. Halliwell, 375; 'Grete pylis and castellys;' Cov. Mysteries, p. 210. Latinised as pela, in a Charter, A. D. 1399 (Ducange). Merely another form of pile, in the sense of 'edifice,' as in Milton, P. L. i. 722; see remarks on Pile (1), below. Cf. W. pill, a shaft, stem, stock, stronghold, which is merely borrowed from E. (and F.) pile; Cotgrave has, among the meanings of pile, 'the bulke or body of a great tree.' The change of vowel, from i to e, is rare, but occurs in F. carene = Lat. carina; we have also pease, M. E. pese, from Lat. pisum.

PEEP (1). Cf. 'A pepe of chekynnys (chickens);' Book of St.

Albans, fol. f 7, l. 4. PEEP (2). The particular expression day-pipe or peep of day is ingeniously explained with reference to the piping or matin-song of the birds in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. This is probably right, and furnishes another link between peep and pipe; cf. Peep (1). But it does not so well explain Palsgrave's je pipe kors, of which I think I have suggested the right explanation. I may add that the passage in Palsgrave to which Wedgwood refers occurs at p. 804, col.1 of the reprint, where we find: 'At daye pype, a la pipe du jour.' So also: 'by the pype of daye;' Life of Lord Grey, Camden Soc., p. 23. PEG. See the account of Pilot below; we may connect peg with

Dan. pegepind, a pointing-pin, from pege, to point, a verb which is prob. connected with pig, a point, and is certainly the same word as Swed. peka, to point.

PENNY-ROYAL. We find Lat. pulegium, O. F. puliol, in Wright's Voc. i. 139; and O. F. puliol real to translate Lat. origanum, id. 140 (as already noted).

PENTHOUSE. Anglo-F. pentiz, pl., Liber Albus, p. 271; spelt appentices, pl., id. 288. PEREMPTORY. Anglo-F. peremptorie, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 245; peremtori, id. ii. 115. PERENNIAL. Or we might explain Lat. perennis as 'lasting through the year.'

PERIWIG. 'Galerus, an hatte, a pirwike;' Cooper's Thesaurus (1565). 'The perwyke, la perrucque;' De Wys, in app. to Palsgrave, PERIWINKLE (2). Halliwell gives prov. E. pennywinkle, a periwinkle, which is a fairly correct form, directly descended from A.S. pinewincla and Lat. pina. Cf. Gk. nivra, nivry, the pinna marina; also, a kind of mussel.

PERRY. M. E. pereye, Will. of Shoreham, ed. Wright, p. 8, 1. 23. -O. F. peré, peiré, perey, perry (Roquefort); whence mod, F. poiré. This explains the E. form correctly, and at once.

PERUSE. I am confirmed in the etymology given by the use of this word in Fitzherbert's Book of Husbandry, first printed in 1523, so that he is a very early authority for it. He uses it just in the sense 'to use up,' or 'go through,' as if from per- and use. Thus a shepherd is instructed to examine all his sheep, 'and thus peruse them all tyll he have done; § 40, 1. 23. The farmer is to number his sheaves, setting aside a tenth for tithes, ' and so to pervse from lande to lande, tyll he have trewely tythed all his corne; § 40, 1. 7; &c. See my edition, p. xxix. As a good instance of a similar word take perstand, to understand, of which Davies says that it occurs several times in Peele's Clyomon and Clamydes. In Palmer's Folk-Etymology, an attempt is made to prove the existence of the apocryphal word to pervise by adducing the spelling perusying (sic), which really stands for perusying = perus-ing, and only furnishes an additional instance of peruse.

PETRIFY. Not (F., - L., - Gk.), but (F., - Gk. and L.).

PEW. Anglo-F. pui, a stage, platform, &c.; see Liber Custumarum, p. 216, and Glossary.

PHARISEE. Gk. oaperaio, Pharisees; from the Aramaic (not tem;' Cath. Angl. (1483).

*PICE, a small copper coin in the E. Indies. (Maráthí.) From Maráthí paisá, a copper coin, of varying value ; the Company's paisá is fixed at the weight of 100 grains, and is rated at 4 to the ana, or 64 to the rupee; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 389. PICNIC. That the latter syllable is connected, as I supposed, with knick-knack, appears from the fact that nicknack was another name for a picnic. 'Janus. I am afraid I can't come to cards, but shall be sure to attend the repast. A nick-nack, I suppose? Cons. Yes, yes, we all contribute as usual; the substantials from Alderman Surloin's; Lord Frippery's cook finds fricassees and ragouts; &c. Foote, The Nabob, Act 1. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

PIDDLE, to trifle. (Scand.?) The sense 'to deal in trifles.' assigned to this verb at p. 441, is not justified. It means rather to triffe with a thing, as if picking at it with the fingers; Todd's Johnson gives one sense as 'to pick at table, to eat squeamishly,' with a quotation from Swift. Wedgwood observes that Skinner gives pittle as another form of the word; and we also find the variant pettle, to trifle (Halliwell). Thus dd is for 11, and we should take the form pittle as the older one, which exactly agrees with the Scand. form. -Swed. dial. pittla, to keep picking at, frequent. of Swed. peta, to pick (Rietz). Perhaps allied to Swed. dial. peka, to pick, and Swed.

picka, E. pick. I do not now think it is connected with peddle. PIKE. We find O. Northumb. horn-pic as a gloss. to pinname (templi) in Luke iv. 9. The Aryan initial p is lost in Celtic; but we may regard pike (and the numerous words allied to it) as being borrowed (through Celtic) from Latin, the initial s of spica being lost. The Wallachian pisc, Engadine piz, the peak of a mountain, may likewise be plausibly explained from Lat. spica. Compare Bpit (1). PILLE (1), a heap. At p. 443 I have inadvertently omitted to separate the senses of F. pile as given by Cotgrave. The senses 'ball, hand-ball,' are due to Lat. pila, a ball ; but the senses 'pile, heap,' are due to Lat. pila, a pillar, a pier of stone. Thus pile (1) is the same as pile (2); the Lat. pila, a ball, being represented in English only by the dimin. pilula, E. pill. Under pile (2) there is also some confusion; the words require great care. Perhaps we may arrange them thus, for etymological purposes. Pile, a heap, stack; F. pile, from Lat. pila. Pile, a pillar, or rather edifice, as in Milton, P. L. i. 722; F. pile, Lat. pila, as before; doublet of peel, a castle; see Peel (4) above. Also pile, in the phrase cross and pile; the same word; see p. 443. Pile, hair, nap; L. pilus. Also pile, a strong stake; A. S. pil, from L. pilum. Also pile, in heraldry, properly a sharpened stake, the same as the last.

PILLION. . Not (C.), but (C., -L.). The Irish and Gael. peall are rather borrowed from than cognate with Lat. pellis.

PILLORY. Wedgwood looks upon the Prov. espitlori 'as furnishing the best clue to the origin of the word;' and thinks it may have originated in some such word as exspectaculorium *, a place for exposing a criminal to public gaze. The idea is good, but for exposing a criminal to public gaze. The idea is good, but the form suggested can hardly be the right one. I would suggest a 'spy-place,' jocularly used. PILOT. Wedgwood has here a very useful note. 'There is no doubt that the origin of the word is Du. peil-loot [now peil-lood, but loot is given in Hexham], a sounding-lead. The only question is as to the way in which the designation was transferred from the lead itself to the person who uses it. The probability appears to be that from the orig. peilloot was formed the O.F. verb piloter or pilotier, to take soundings (Cotgrave, Palsgrave), and thence pilote, the man who takes them. From F. I suppose that the word piloot (Kilian) or pilote (Biglotton) passed back into Dutch, where it will be seen that the connection with peilen or pijlen, to take soundings, has become obscured by the passage of the word through a foreign tongue.' He then observes that sect. e in my Dictionary is wrong, which is the case. Hexham gives peylen, pijlen, to sound the deepth (sic) of water; and I have unluckily taken pijlen as the truer form. On the contrary, peylen (mod. Du. peilen, G. peilen) is the right form, and is a mere contraction of O. Du. pegelen, to measure the concavity or the capacity of anything; Hexham. - O. Du. (and Du.) pegel, the capacity of a vessel, gauge. This word is rather of Danish than of Du. origin, being the Dan. pagel, a half-pint measure; it is due to the Danish custom of marking off the inside of a drinking-ve-sel by pegs, pins, or knobs, as explained by Molbech, s. v. pægel. Cf. Dan. pege, to point, pegefinger, the fore-finger (pointer), pegepind, a pointing pin or fescue; whence the Dan. pagel (as if 'little pointer') wr prob. derived. These words exhibit the usual Danish weakenir

h to g, since they are the same as Swed. peka, to point, pek finger, $ fore-finger, pek-pinne, pointing pin. Prob. allied to Dan. pig, Swed. pik, a pike; see also note on Peg (p. 821). I conclude that Diez is right in supposing that the Du. piloo, a pilot, was borrowed from French, being formed from F. piloter, to sound. But it is also true that F. piloter was, in its turn, borrowed from O. Du. peyl-loot (now peil-lood), a sounding-lead; compounded of peylen, short for pegelen, to gauge (from pegel, a little peg), and loot, cognate with E lead. Thus to pilot is really 'to gauge depths by a lead, as one gauges depths in a tankard by a little peg."

PINCH. Dante has picchia, Purg. x. 120 (but some read nicchia). (A. L. M.) Florio gives only pieciare in the sense to pinch; but both picciare and picchiare in the sense 'to knock at a door.' PINCHBECK. The place in Lincolnshire is spelt Pyncebek in the Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 127.

PINE-APPLE. We actually find the pine-tree called 'pinapletre;' see Du Wys, in app. to reprint of Palsgrave, p. 915, col. I

(ab. 1532). PINK (1). Not (C.), but perhaps (C., - L.). This word presents much difficulty. My view is that these apparently Celtic words (see sect.  $\beta$ ) are all due to Lat. spica, which I take to be also the origin of pike, peak, &c., pike being merely a shortened form of spike. See note on Pike above. As to sect.  $\gamma$  of this article, it is certain that A. S. pyngan is from Lat. pungers; but pink cannot be from

A. S. pyngan. PIPPIN. The probability that a pippin is an apple raised from a pippin or pip is borne out by the following. 'To plante trees of preynes and pepins; 'Arnold's Chron., 1502, ed. 1811, p. 167. PIROUETTE. Cf. Walloon berweter, to pirouette, to roll over and over (Sigart).

PISTACHIO. Also fistiq, fistuq; Rich. Dict. p. 1090, where it is cited as an Arabic word; but the word is Persian, from Pers.

pistah, the pistachio-nut; Rich. Dict. p. 332. PIT. The pit of a theatre was formerly called the cock-pit; see Nares. Cf. Shak. Hen. V. prol. 11. Dryden uses pit repeatedly, as e.g. in Epilogue to All for Love, l. 3.

PLAGUE. Caxton has flaghe as a verb, tr. of Reynard, c. 28; ed. Arber, p. 70, l. 9. PLAID. Not (Gael.), but (Gael., -L). See note on Pillion

PLAINTAIN. To be marked as (F., -L.).

PLANK. Cf. Walloon planke, a plank (Sigart).

PLASTER. Cf. M.E. emplaster, sb., Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 54; emplastur, Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, last page; emplasters, pl., id. p. 22. This shews the full form; cf. censer for encenser, print for imprint or emprint.

PLATE. This even appears in A.S., borrowed from Low Latin.

Obrizum, platum, smæte gold; ' Mone, Quellen, p. 403. PLATEAU. This word occurs (perhaps for the first time in E.) in a description of the Battle of Eylau in the Annual Register, 1807, p. 11, col. 2, where we read of 'a rising ground or flattish hill, which, in the military phraseology of the French, is called a plateau.' PLAYHOUSE. The existence of this word even in A. S. is

Quellen, p. 366. *PLIGHT (3), condition, state. (F., -L.) It is quite certain that plight, in the sense of condition, or state, is a separate word from plight in the sense of danger or engagement. This is pointed out by Wedgwood, who remarks that plight, condition, should have been spelt plite. As a fact, such is the M. E. form, as already noticed in the instance from Chaucer, C. T. 16420 (see Six-text, Group G. l. 952); so also in Chaucer, C. T. 10209 (Six-text, E. 2335). - O. F. plite, occurring in Littleton's Tenures, foll. 69 and 83 back (cd. 1612), where it is spelt plyte; also spelt plyte, plite in Roquefort, who explains it by 'condition, state.' A fem. form answering to O. F. ploi, situation, plight; of which three examples are given by Lacurne de Sainte Palaye; Wedgwood gives ploit in the same sense, from the Fabliau of the Miller and Clerks in Wright's Anecdota Literaria, p. 22. This O. F. ploi is the same as F. pli, 'a plait, fold, also a habit,' Cot.; and corresponds, ac-cordingly, to E. Plait, q. v.; and also to Plight (2), q. v. Thus O. F. ploi, F. pli, is from Lat. plicatum, or rather plicitum; whilst O. F. ploi, F. pli, is from Lat. plicatum, or rather plicitum; whilst O. F. plite or pliste = Lat. plicita; both from Lat. plicare, to fold. ¶ I must here add that Wedgwood derives plight, in the sense of 'engagement,' from O. F. plaid, Lat. placitum, from which I entirely dissent, preferring to derive plight (1) from A.S. plint, peril, hence forfeit, engagement. [The O.F. plaid is, in fact, E. plaa; see Plea.] It is c' S. plint (not O. F. plaid), which is related to such ta, to bind by oath, forplikta, to oblige, engage, wr J ige, bind, Du. Dan. and Swed. pligt, duty, Fight (1) at p. 450.

PLOT (1). 'Now to confirm the complet then hast cast;' Spen. Tragedy (ab. 1594); in Hazlitt's Old Plays, v. 74. This shews complot in use before 1600.

PLUNDER. A slightly earlier example occurs in Bp. Hall's Episcopacie by Divine Right, 1640, § 1, p. 3: ' the feare of plundering a faire temporall estate by the furious multitude.

PLUNGE. Cf. Anglo-F. se plunge, plunges, Bestiary, l. 832. POLECAT. Probably (F., - L.). I now believe the suggestion. that it means a cat that goes after poultry, to be the right one. Chaucer, speaking of the 'polcat,' says that it slays capors; C.T. 12789. The difficulty as to the difference of vowel between the . in polcat and the ow in F. poule, can be accounted for. On the one hand, the E. word also appears as pulcatte in the Book of St. Albans, fol. f 4, back; and, in the Prompt. Parv., though the word is printed polkat, Way notes that the MS. has pulkat. In Shak. Merry Wives, iv. 1. 29, the first folio has powlkats, and there is a play upon the word, Quickly mistaking it for Lat. pulcher. Even Gay (according to Palmer's Folk-Etymology) has the spelling toulcats. On the other hand, the French pouls must once have taken the form pole, or polle, though the only traces of this I have yet found are these, viz. (1) polle, a virgin, occurring in the Cantilene de Sainte Eulalie, l. 10, which is the same word, as it represents the Lat. pulla; (2) the spellings pol-ain, pol-age in Roquefort, for poulain. poulage; and (3) O. F. pol-ette for poul-ette, in Littre. Add to these the Prov. pola, Span. polla, Ital. polla (in Florio); and I think we see sufficient reason for explaining pole-cal as 'poule' cat. It is very remarkable that we never say pooliry but pole-try, for pouliry; see also the Anglo-F. forms given under Poult, below. ¶ I observe that the new edition of Ogilvie's Dict. suggests poult-cat; surely poule-cat is much more exact. Cf. Puttock.

POLICY. The etymology given is that offered by Diez in the earlier editions of his work; in the 4th edition he suggests a derivation from pollex, which Scheler (in a note at p. 727) thinks less likely.

POLL To be marked as (O. Low  $G_{.,-}C_{.?}$ ).

POLLUTE. The pp. pollutyd occurs in the Cov. Mysteries,

P. 154. POLONY. For Bolony; this spelling of Bologna occurs in San Caterraya S. Y. america. Webbe's Travels, 1590, ed. Arber, p. 30. See Cotgrave, s. v. sauciue. POOL (1). Not (C.), but (C., -L.). The O. W. form is pull, not a Celtic word, but borrowed from Late Lat. padulem, acc. of padulis, whence also Ital. padule, Port. paul, a marsh, piece of marshy ground. This late Lat. padulis is obviously a corrupt form, put for paludis, from paludi-, crude form of Lat. palus, a swamp, marsh, fen, pool. See W. Stokes, Cornish Glossary, in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 212, and Diez, s. v. padule, 4th ed. p. 388. Vaniček suggests that pal-us is a compound word; the former part may be compared with Skt. palvala, a pool, palala, mire, mud, and Gk. wylor, mud; whilst the base -ud- may be connected with Lat. und a and E. wat-er.

POOR. I have already said that I understand the M.E. pours to stand for poure. We actually find ' The power and nedy ;' Roy, Rede

Me, ed. Arber, p. 76 (A. D. 1528). POPINJAY. Anglo-F. papejayes, pl., parrots, occurs in 1355; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 35. POPLIN, See an excellent suggestion in N. and Q. 6 S. vi.

305, that poplin may have been named from Popering, mentioned in Chaucer's Rime of Sir Thopas; as to which Tyrwhitt says that 'Poppering or Poppeling, was the name of a parish in the Marches of Calais; our famous antiquary Leland was once rector of it; see Tanner, Bib. Brit. in v. Leland.' Poperin pears were famous; see Nares. Also called Poperingen, Poperingne. It was famous for manufactures 'de draps, de serges, et autres étoffes ;' Le Grand Dict. Géographique, par M. Bruzen La Martinière, La Haye, 1736. It is near Ypres, in W. Flanders. As to the spelling papeline, we find a similar exchange of vowels in O. Du. pappel-boom, also populierboom, a poplar (Hexham). PORE (2). See note to Pour, below.

PORRIDGE. Not (F., -L.), but (F., -C., -L.). I have now no doubt that Wedgwood is right in considering this as merely another form of pottage, which first became poddige (still preserved in the Craven word poddisk, see Halliwell), and afterwards porrige or porridge. Hence Cotgrave gives polage, ' pottage, porridge; ' cl the Sonthern E. errish, stubble, put for eddish, A.S. edise. I know of no example of porridge earlier than Skakespeare, who prob. introduces it as a dialectal form; he uses porridge eight times, but pottage not at all. A confusion with M. E. porree, a kind of pottage (but properly containing pot-herbs) may easily have helped this change of form. β. I may observe that the derivation of porridge from O.F. porce is given in Todd's Johnson and in Richardson; Mahn (in Webster) for which see below. v. I must also note that F. porrée and F. purée are different words; porrée = Low Lat. porrecta, from porrum; but purée, says Brachet, is for peurée = peurée, Lat. piperata.

PORRINGER, a small dish for porridge. Not (F., -L.; with E. suffix), but (F., - C., - L. ; with E. suffix). Porringer and porridge are corruptions from pottinger (at first pottanger) and pottage. This is ascertained by the old form pottanger in Palsgrave, who gives: "Pottanger, escuele, avrillon;" and again, Baret (1580) has: "Potenger, or little dish with eares." Halliwell notes that pottenger is still in use in Devon. The intrusive n (before the soft g) is precisely the same as in messenger, passenger, scavenger. We actually find 'poregers of pewter;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 115 (1522). POSE (1), section 3. The true derivatives of Lat. ponere appear not only in the sbs. such as position, but also in the verbs compound, expound, propound, and the adjectives ponent, component, &c. POSE (3), a cold in the head. For (E.?), read (C.). Th

The word is certainly Celtic, from W. pas, a cough ; cf. Corn. pas, Bret. paz, a cough, Irish casachdas, a cough, Skt. kas, to cough. Lithuan. kosti, to cough. - V KAS, to cough; see note upon A. S. hwistan at the end of the article on Wheese. (Suggested by A. L. Mayhew.) POT. Not (C.), but (C., - L.). The Irish potaim, I drink, Gael. foit, is not cognate with, but borrowed from Lat. potare. The genuine O. Irish derivative from  $\checkmark$  PA appears as ibim, I drink, in which the initial p is dropped; see Fick, iv. 159. POTASH. Mentioned as early as 1502. 'Xiij. ll. pot-asshes;' Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 187.

POTATION. Spelt potacion, Cov. Myst. p. 138.

POULT. The M. E. puller (our pouller-er) answers to Anglo-F. poleter, pulleter; see Stat. of the Realm, i. 351; Liber Albus, p. 465. Poultry answers to Anglo-F. poletrie, pultrie, Lib. Albus, p. 231.

POUNCE (1). The claws on the three front toes of a hawk's foot were called pownces; Book of St. Albans, fol. a 8. See note on Talon, below.

PRECINCT. Spelt precincte, Will. of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 298; precinct, id. p. 299.

PREFER. Spelt preferre in Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 30; ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 28. PREMISES.

An excellent example of the old use of the word occurs in the Will of Lady Margaret (1508). 'All which maners, londs, and tenements, and other the premisses, we late purchased, &cc.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 378. There are numerous similar examples in Caxton's print of the Statutes of Hen. VII.

PRETTY. We can trace the W. praith still further back. Spurrell explains W. praith by 'practice,' as well as 'act or deed;' and Prof. Rhys points out that W. -ith = Lat. -ct, as in W rhaith = Lat. rectum, &c.; see his Lectures on Welsh Philology, p. 64. Hence W. praith answers to, and was prob. borrowed from, Low Lat. practica, execution, accomplishment, performance. And this Lat. word is, of course, merely borrowed from Greek; see further under Practice. It is clear that the same Low L. practica will also account for Icel. prettr, a trick, piece of roguery, which answers to it both in form and sense; for practica also meant 'trickery,' like the E. practice in Elizabethan writers.-A. L. M. The suffix -y in pretty is, accordingly, English; but the A. S. pratt may have been borrowed from British, which in its turn was borrowed from Latin, and ultimately from Gk. Thus the word may (probably) be marked as  $(L_{.,} - Gk_{.}; with E_{.})$ suffix.). The Icel. prettr may have been borrowed from English.

PRICKLE. 'Stimulis, pricelsum;' Mone, Quellen, p. 417. *PRIG(1), to steal. (E.) This is a cant term of some antiquity; prig, sb., a thief, occurs in Shak. Wint. Ta. iv. 3, 108. It arose in the time of Elizabeth, and is merely a cant modification of E. prick, which orig. meant to ride, as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 1, P. Plowman, B. xviii. 11, 25. Hence it came to mean to ride off, to steal a horse, and so, generally, to steal. This we learn from Harman's Caveat. 1567, where we find: 'to prygge, to ryde,' p. 84, col. 3; and at p. 42: 'a prigger of praumcers be horse-stealers: for to prigge signifieth in their language to steale, and a praumcer is a horse.' Again, at p. 43, he tells how a gentleman espied a pryggar, and charged 'this prity prigging person to walke his horse well' for him; whereupon 'this peltynge priggar, proude of his praye, walkethe his horse vp and downe tyll he sawe the Gentleman out of sighte, and leapes him into the saddell, and awaye he goeth a-mayne.' That is how it was done. We find a similar weakening of k to g in Lowl. Sc. prigga-trout, a banstickle, or stickleback (evidently for pricker-trout), and in Lowl. Sc. prigmedainty, the same as prickmedainty, one who dresses in a finical manner (or as we now say, a prig). Gawain Douglas, Prol. to Virgil, bk. viii. st. 8, already has: 'Sum prig penny,' which is thought to mean ' some haggle for a penny,' though the passage is obscure. Halliwell also gives prygman, a thief, which hesitates between this solution and the possibility of a corruption occurs in Awdelay's Fraternyte of Vacabondes, ed. Furnivall, p. 35 from pottage. The question is decided by the etymology of porringer. and prig, to ryde, in Dekker's Lanthorne, sig. C. ii. So also trigger and prig, to ryde, in Dekker's Lanthorne, sig. C. ii. So also trigger stands for tricker.

*PRIG (2), a pert, pragmatical fellow. (E.) 'A cane is part of the dress of a prig;' Tatler, no. 77 (1709). From the verb to prick, in the sense to trim, adorn, dress up ; Latimer (Works, i. 253, Parker Soc.) speaks of women having 'much pricking,' and inveighs against their 'pricking up of themselves.' Cf. Lowl. Sc. prig-me-dainty for prick-me-dainty, a prig, which occurs in Udall, Roister Doister, ii. 3, ed. Arber, p. 36. See Prig (1). PRIME (1). Primacy answers to Anglo-F. primacie, Polit. Songs,

p. 311; primacye, Langtoft's Chron. i. 170.

PRIMROSE. I should have added the O.F. form primerole, a primrose; it occurs in Le Roman de la Rose, l. 8264, and, according to Littre, is still in use. Dr. Prior invents the form primeverole, which it will puzzle any one to find, and is certainly wrong. Florio has primula as an Ital. form, as well as primawra. The curious spelling primarose occurs in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b 7, and pt.

ii. fol. b 3, back. PRINT. See note upon Imprint, above. It is best to take imprint (or rather M. E. emprenten) as the source of print, verb. No doubt print, sb., arose in the same way.

PROGENITOR. Spelt progenytour, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 91, l. 25; progenitour, Cov. Myst. p. 67. PROPENSE. Anglo-F. purpense, Laws of Will. I. § 2.

PROBODY. Spelt prosodye, Cov. Mysteries, p. 189.

*PROSTHETIC, prefixed. (Gk.) Modern; as if for Gk. #poofferinds, lit. disposed to add, giving additional power; allied to Gk. apósoeros, added, put to ; cf. apósoess, a putting to, attaching. -Gk. após, to; 0e-rós, placed, put, verbal adj. from the base 0e-, to place; see Thome. Cf. Gk. art-verusós - Lat. adiectiuus.

PROXY. Anglo-F. procuracie, Liber Albus, p. 423. PTARMIGAN. The word was actually once spelt termagant. 'Heath-cocks, capercailzies and termagants;' Taylor the Water Poet (1618), ed. Hindley; cited in Palmer's Folk-Etymology, p. 386. PUDDLE (1). The Welsh is pudel, not in the dictionaries; whence pudelog, adj., full of puddles (D. Silvan Evans). Stratmann has both podel and plod, and it seems best to take podel as standing for plodel*, dimin. of plod, a pool. - Irish and Gael. plod, a pool, standing water. The root is uncertain and it may have been, originally, not a Celtic word. It reminds us of Lat. acc. paludem.

PUISSANT. The sb. puissance was used by Richard, Duke of York, in 1452; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 11. PUNCH (2). A very clear example is in the Cov. Myst. p. 75.

Punchyth me, Lorde,' i. e. punish me, Lord.

PUNCH (3). Mr. Yates Thompson sends me a very curious instance of the occurrence of this word. He writes : Monsieur de la Boullaye-le-Gouz, in his Travels (Paris, 1652) defines Bolleponge [his spelling of E. bowl of punck] as follows. 'Bolleponge est un mot Anglois, qui signifie un boisson dont les Anglois usent aux Indes, faite de sucre, suc de limon, eau de vie, fleur de muscade, et biscuit The ingredients are here five in number. The traveller was rostv.' in India in 1649. 'Palapuntz, an Indian drink,' &c. ; Coles, ed. 1684. PUNY. Anglo-F. pune, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 83; spelt puisne, id. iii. 317

PUPPY (1). 'Smale ladies popis;' Book of St. Albans, fol. f 4, back

PURSULAIN, 1. 5. After 'Prompt. Parv., p. 417,' insert : -F. porcelaine, pourcelaine, 'the herb purslane;' Cot. PURSULE. Anglo-F. persuer (error for pursuer), Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 27; pursuer, F. Chron. of London (Camd. Soc.), p. 76. The O. F. suir (F. suivre) is from Low Lat. sequere, substituted for Lat. moui.

PURTENANCE. Anglo-F. apurtenance, Langtoft's Chron. i.

438; aportonance, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 69. PURVEY. Anglo-F. purvoier, to provide, Liber Custumarum, p. 216; purvoer, Stat. of the Realm. i. 192, an. 1323. Note also Anglo-F. purvedunce, purveyance, Polit. Songs, p. 231; purveour, a purveyor, Stat. of the Realm, i. 137, an. 1300.

*PURVIEW, a proviso or enactment. (F., -L.) Now applied to the enacting part of a statute as opposed to the preamble, and so called because it formerly began with the words purven est, it is provided. Spelt purvieu in Blount. - Anglo-F. purveu = O. F. pourveu, provided, Cotgrave; mod. F. pourvu. Pp. of O. F. porvoir, F. pour voir ; see Purvey.

PYRAMID. Palmer's Folk-Etymology contains the following : 'The word is no doubt of Egyptian origin, probably from pi-ram, "the lofty," from ram, aram, to be high (S. Birch, in Bunsen's Egypt, QUAFF. I regard the final -t in Palsgrave's quaught as due to a sb. quaught. a draught, in which the -t is suffixed, as in draugh-t from draw, laugh-t-er from laugh; cf. also hois-t, waf-t, graf-t. G. Douglas has wouch', to quaff (see Jamieson), but Dunbar has the simple form, as in : 'They wouchit at the wicht wyne,' they quaffed at the strong wine; Maitland Poems, p. 46. This is decisive as to the later addition of t. Cf. 'The queff, or cup, is filled to the brim ;' Hone, Tablebook, i. 467.

QUAINT. Cf. Anglo-F. quaintement, quaintly, Langtoft's Chron. i. 258

QUARREL (1). Spelt quarel; Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 37;

ed. Arber, p. 103, l. 7. QUARBY (2), a heap of slaughtered game. (F.,-L.) account of F. curée given in Littré shews decisively that the explanation given under this word is wrong. The point is one of difficulty, and turns on the fact that the O.F. curse and corse, given by Burguy as variants of the same word, are really quite different words. I have correctly given the etymology of O. F. coree, formed from Lat. cor, the heart; unfortunately, this is not the E. word. β. The O.F. curee appears, in its oldest form, as cuiree, and this form is given by Roquesort, with a correct derivation. He explains eniree as meaning 'la curée des chiens de chasse, de corium.' Now it is precisely this O. F. ewiree which explains our word; it was naturally written as querre (dissyllabic) in Middle English, as in the quotation already cited; and afterwards became quarry, precisely as we have clark for clerk, dark for M. E. derk, &c., &c. Littre gives a long quotation from Modus, fol. 23 back (of the 14th century), shewing that the quarry, as given to the dogs, was prepared and given to them in the skin of the slain animal. This is confirmed by the allusions to the querre or quyrre in The Book of St. Albans, fol. f 3, back, and fol. f 4, where we are told that it 'callid is, I-wis, The quyrre, aboue the skyn for it etyn is.' Hence O. F. cuiree is formed (with suffix -e = L. -ala) from cuir, skin, hide. - L. corium, hide, skin. See Cuirass. Scheler accepts this explanation as decisive; the old etymology, as given in Brachet, must be set aside. Moreover, the above etymology is confirmed by the use of the word in the Venery de Twety, pr. in Reliq. Antiq. i. 153, where we find : 'the houndes shal be rewardid with the nekke and with the bewellis, with the fee, and thei shal be etyn undir the skyn, and therfore it is clepid the quarre.' QUASH. Anglo-F. quasser, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 111.

QUAY. Anglo F. kaie, kaye, key; Gloss to Liber Albus. With the W. cas cf. Irish cas, a hedge, O. Irish cai, a house (Cormac's Glossary). 'The root is KI (Skt. ci), whence moirn, mum, Lat. quies, Goth. haims, E. home;' Whitley Stokes, in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, QUICKSAND. 'Aurippus, cwece-sond,' lit. quake-sand, Wright's Voc. ii. 8 (11th cent.). It has been shewn that quake and quick are closely related : and see Quagmire. QUICKSILVER. 'Argentum uiuum, cwicseel/or;' Wright's Voc. ii. 8 (11th cent.).

QUILT. Anglo.F. quilte, quilt of a bed, occurs in the Black Prince's Will (1376); Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 74. QUINCE. In Wright's Vocab. i. 163, we find F. coigner, glossed by a coyn-tre or a quince-tre; at p. 181, we find quyne-tre; and at p. 192, a quoyne-tre. When we compare these with quyne-aple-tre in Palsgrave, it becomes clear that quince or quins is merely the plural of guyne or quin; and that quince-tree is a tree bearing quins. Again quin, quoyn, or coin is from O. F. coin, a quince, as already said. For -ce as a pl. suffix, cf. mice, pence, lice, dice. QUINQUACESIMA, l. 1. For 'second' read 'next.'

QUINSY. M. E. squinancie, spelt squynansy (14th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 51. The prefixed s may be regarded as due to O. F. es-Lat. ex, used as an intensive prefix. Hence the F. form esquinance in Cotgrave.

RACK(1). Early examples of the sb. occur in: 'a peyre rakkes of yryne; Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 56, l. 27; 'rakkes and brandernes of erne' [iron]; id. p. 57, l. 37; A. D. 1424. Also: 'a rake of yren,' described as used for roasting eggs on; id. p. 102, l. 5; A. D. 1434. I strongly suspect the word was borrowed from the Nathender of ODE Netherlands. Cf. O. Du. recke, a perch, or a long pole; een reck der sogelen, a hen-roost; recken, to rack; reck-banck, 'a racke, or a torture-bank; 'Hexham.

RACK (3). The latter part of the definition 'to subject it to a ermetic so,' is prob. wrong; I forget whence it was copied ferm ). Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 305, says: 'it is in com-(F' wine or beere from the lees, which we call 2

vol. v. p. 763). Brugsch says that in Egyptian pir-am-us is "edge of  $\frac{1}{2}$  racking, whereby it will clarifie much the sconer; cf. also § 306. the pyramid," and abumir, "a pyramid" (Egypt under the Pharaoks, vol i p. 73). These accounts do not agree; perhaps both are false. Wedgwood quotes Languedoc araca le bi, transvaser le vin, which be derives from draco or raco, dregs, in the same language. Whether derives from draco or raco, dregs, in the same language. Whether draco and raco are connected words I do not know; but we may similarly derive F. raquer, in Cotgrave, from raque, dirt, mud. mire, in the same; roque may have been taken in the sense of 'dregs. Cotgrave also gives rasque, 'the scurf of a scauld head;' cf. mod. F. ergade as curf (Littre). It seems to me to make little difference to the etymology. The F. raquer meant 'to clear from dregs,' from the sb. raque, dirt. I take the orig. sense of raque or rasque to have been scrapings,' racke being another form of the same word. Littre connects rache with Prov., Span., Port. rascar, to scrape; see further under Rascal.

RAID. Lord Dacre, who made many a raid into Scotland, calls it 'a rode;' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 249. Wyntown speaks of a Sir Andrew, who 'made syndry radis in Ingland;' viii. 34. 34. (Jamieson.)

RAIL (2), to use reviling language. Littre cites from Ducange O. F. rasgler, to rail, which he regards as derived from Lat. ras-um, supine of radere; and he considers this as confirming the supposed equation of F. railler to Lat. radulare*, from the same source. Wedgwood connects F. railler with Du. rallen, to prate, ratelen, to rattle; but it is shown, under Rail (3), that the F. verb hence derived is raler, O. F. raller, and I doubt if F. railler and raler can be thus equated. See Scheler.

RAIL (3). Spelt raale, Book of St. Albans, fol. f 7, back. This agrees better with the F. form. RAISE, 1. 5. By 'the simple verb,' I mean the form answering to E. rise; i. e. there is no Swed. risa, nor Dan. rise.

* RAJPOOT, a prince. (Hind., - Skt.) Hind. rajpút, a prince, lit. the son of a rajah; Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 434.-Skt. rájá, a king; putra, a son; so that the lit. sense is 'son of a king.'

BANK (1). Anglo-F. renc, a ring of people, Life of Edw. Coaf. 1. 3363; rencs, ranks, id, 1923. Here we find final c for g, as in teach and stank.

RANKLE. Perhaps (F., - L.) rather than (E.). We find the sb. rancle, a festering sore, in the 14th cent.; see Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 52, 53. Also rancle, verb, as in : ' maake the legges to rancle ;' Book 52, 53. Also ranke, vero, as in : make the legges to ranke; book of St. Albans, fol. a 3, back. The sb. corresponds to Anglo-F. ranke, a sore, in the Life of Edw. Conf. 2677; we also find the pp. f. ranke, festered, and the pp. aranele, putrified, in the same, ll. 4166, 2615. These are forms of the 12th century. These words are to be connected with F. rance, putrified, rather than with E. rank, coarse in growth; and F. rance is from Lat. acc. rancidum; see Rancid. The confusion between E. rank and F. rance has already been pointed out ; see Rank (2).

BAP(1). Rap and rend occurs in Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 74-BAPE(1). 'Murdre, rape, and treson;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard.

33, ed. Arber, p. 95. RAPE (3). In the sense of 'division of a county,' it occurs in Arnold's Chron., (about 1502), ed. 1811, p. 181.

RAPT. 'Here y felte my-selfe fyrst rapte in spyryte ;' Moak of Evesham, ed. Arber, c. xiii., p. 33. 'He was rapte,' id. c. vi., p. 36. RASCAL. Cf. Anglo-F. rascaylle, a host, a rabble, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 293; raskayle, Langtoft's Chron. i. 136; raskayle, id. ii. 296. The O. F. raskaille is also verified by the occurrence of the Walloon rascaille = mod. F. racaille (Sigart). Note also M.E. rasskayle, Rich. the Redeles, ii. 129; rascall, Boke of St. Albans, fol. e 1.

RASH (3). In the Anglo-French Bestiary by Philip de Tham, 1. 371, we read of an animal who is able 'detrencher granz arbres e racher,' which Mr. Wright explains by to 'cut down and fell great trees.' It is rather to 'root up,' from Lat. radicare, used with the sense of eradicare.

RAVEN (2). The Anglo-F. ravine is actually found with the sense of 'rapine,' as suggested ; it occurs in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 346, and Liber Custumarum, p. 18. See just below.

RAVENOUS. The connection with M. E. ravine, plunder, appears clearly in Caxton's tr. of Reynard (1481). In c. 32 (ed. Arber, p. 92, l. 27), we find 'couetyse [covetousness] and ranged'; Arber, p. 92, i. 27), we find "outly a for the second of the second seco

See Devic, Supp. to Littre; he gives the Arab. name as rabab or rabába.

RECOIL. Also spelt recule, in the sense 'retreat ;' Eng. Garner, vii. 126, 133 (ab. 1606). 'I recule, I nice schee techer, Inge Schner, yonder gonne reculeth,' &c.; Palsgrave. Cf. Anglo-F. recullant, recoiling, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 176; se recolt, recoils, id. ii. 292. *REDGUM, a disease of infants. (E.) Fully explained in my Notes to P. Plowman, C. xxiii. 83, p. 444. M. E. reed gounde, Prompt. Parv. - A. S. read, red; gund, matter of a sore.

REDOUBT. Not (111, -L.), but (F., -1tal., -L.). Ben Jonson has redouts, Underwoods, lxxix. 1. 8; according to Mr. Palmer, some editions give the spelling reduits. Cotgrave has reduite, 'a blockhouse, or little fort;' from Lat. reducta, pp. fem. of reducere; this is the corresponding F. word. But Littre shews that the F. redoute, a redoubt, was in use in the 16th century, and from this the E. word was borrowed. The F. redoute is from Ital. ridotto; so that the article is otherwise correct.

RELAY. 'Then all the relais thow may vppon hem [the harts] make, Even at his [their] comyng, yf thow lett thy howndys goo; Book of St. Albans, fol. e 8, back.

Lectures, p. 12. RELINQUISH. Cf. Anglo-F. relinquiz, pp. pl.; Stat. of the Realm, i. 252; A.D. 1326.

RELY. In his book 'On English adjectives in -able,' Dr. F. Hall supposes rely to be connected with M.E. relye, to rally (already noticed by me under Rally) and M. E. relevant, to lift up again, from F. relever, which seem to have been confused. The numerous instances of these verbs given in his notes, at pp. 158-160, should be consulted. It is certainly possible that these verbs, now both obsolete, had something to do with suggesting our modern verb. But it clearly took up a new sense, and is practically, as now used, a compound of re-and lie (1). The M. E. relye answers to an O. F. relier = Lat. re-

Replieve, to bind. REPLEVY. Cf. Anglo-F. replevi, pp. replevied; Stat. of the Realm, i. 161 (an. 1311); Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 13. To the derivatives add repute, sb., Shak. Troil. i. 3.

337. REREDOS. Spelt rerdoos in 1463; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms,

P. 39. RESCUE. We find rescu as a sb. in the Cov. Mysteries, p. 114. Either the sb, was formed anew from the verb, or the M. E. rescous was supposed to be a pl. form. This may account for Mrs. Quickly's remark—'bring a rescue or two;' 2 Hen. IV. ii. 1. 62. RESIDUE. The final -e indicates the fem. gender, as occurring in the Anglo-F. phrase somme residue, the residue, Stat. of the Realm, i. 344, an. 1353. So also ague is a fem. form. RETAIL. Cf. Anglo-F. a retail, by retail, Stat. of the Realm,

1.178, an. 1318; en retaille, id. 313, an. 1351. RETRIEVE. The use of the word as a term of the chase is proved by the occurrence of M.E. retriver, a retriever (dog), in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b 3, back; and of the verb retrine, said of a hawk, in the same, fol. b 4. See also the remark upon Contrive. above.

REVEILLE. 'So soon love beats revellies [reveilles 1] in her breast ; ' Davenant, Gondibert, b. iii. c. 5. st. 1.

REVERIE, REVERY. The connection between revery and raw is well illustrated by the use of the word rawery in the sense of 'raving,' which occurs in Gauden, Tears of the Church, 1659, p. 366. See Davies, Supp. Glossary. So also the Anglo-F. reverye means

*a raving '; Langtoft's Chron. ii. 168. REWARD. Anglo-F. rewarder, v., Langtoft's Chron. i. 176. BHUBARB. M. E. rwbarbe (14th cent.); Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 55. RIBAND. Scheler notes that the Low Lat. rubanus first occurs A.D. 1367; see Ducange. We already find the Anglo-F. pl. rubaignes, and sing. rubaym in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, 381, an. 1363, and the M. E. pp. rybanyd, adorned with gold threads, in P. Plow-man, A. ii, 13 (foot-note), an. 1362. BICE. We find in Mandeville's Trav. p. 310, the form ryze. BINGDOVE. Put for ring'd dove. 'The rynged dove, le

RECLUSE. The mase, form reclus also occurs, as 'the reclus  $\hat{\phi}$  BOCK (1). There seems to have been an A.S. rocc, gen. pl. rocca; so that the E. word may have been borrowed directly from Celtic. This strengthens the evidence for a Celtic origin. 'Scopu-BOODLOFT. M. E. rodelofte, A.D. 1431, Early E. Wills, ed.

Furnivall, p. 90, l. 8. See Loft, which is of Scand. origin. BOOK (2). The explanation, that the name is from the Skt.

BOOT (2). Cf. 'earth-wroting snout;' Return from Parnassus,

A. iii. sc. 4. BOSE. To be marked as (F., - L., - Gk., - Arab., - Pers.?) Rose is, after all, an Aryan word; the Arab. ward is really the Armenian ward, and the word is of Iranic origin; Curtius, i. 438. BOWLOCK, ROLLOCK, RULLOCK. The history of this word is imperfectly known; in Ashe's Dict. (1775) it is oddly spelt rowlack. The true A.S. word was árloc (Ettmüller); we find columbaria, ár-locu, Wright's Voc. i. 63. Hence M. E. orlok, Liber Albus, pp. 235, 237, 239. This word is compounded of A. S. ár, an oar, and loc, cognate with G. lock, a hole, as is evident from comparing G. ruderlock or rudergat, a rowlock, rullock, or oar-hole. The A. S. loc is also allied to A.S. loca = the modern E. lock, in the sense of 'fastening'; and is derived from loc-m, the pp. of the strong verb lucan, to lock, fasten; see Lock (1). The orig. oar-fastenings or rullocks were, at least in some cases, actual holes; and hence at a later period we find them called oar-holes. In a Nominale pr. in Wright's Voc. i. 239, we find : 'Hoc columber, are-hole,' whereupon the editor notes that it means 'an air-hole, a small unglazed window.' This is quite wrong; are is the Northern form of oar, and columber is for Lat, columbare. In Hexham's Du. Dict. the O. Du, riemgaten and rosygaten are explained by 'the oars-holes to put out the oares." Hence, in the word rullock, we know that -lock signifies ' hole.' And, as to the whole word, I believe it to be nothing but another form of M. E. orlok, i. e. oarlock. The shifting of r is common in English; and, in this instance, it was assisted by confusion with the verb to row, and (possibly) with the O. Du. roeygat. If so, the spelling rowlock is merely due to popular etymology; it does not express the pronunciation. Worcester's Dict. gives the form rollock, which is even better than rullock (etymologically).

RUBBISH. Another extract, shewing that the word was orig. a plural form, is : 'ony rubyes, dung, or rycsshes' [rushes]; Arnold s Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 91. Cf. Anglo-F. robouse; Liber Albus, pp. 579, 581. *RUFF (4), a game at cards. (F.) Mentioned in Cotgrave, and in Florio (1598); and see Nares. Now applied to the act of trumping instead of following suit, but orig. the name of a game (called also trump) like whist. Evidently a modification of F. ronfle, 'handruffe, at cards'; jouer à la ronfle, ' to play at hand-ruffe, also to snore ; ' Cot. So also Ital. ronfa, 'a game at cards called ruffe or trumpe; ronfare, 'to snort, snarle; also, to ruff or trump at cards;' Florio. Prob. of jocular origin, the trumping (when perhaps unexpected) being likened to a snarl, or the spitting of a cat; cf. ronfammii, 'snortings, snarlings, or tuffings of a cat;' Florio. Of imitative origin; cf. Ital. ronzare, 'to humme or buzze,' Florio; Span. roncar, 'to snore, also, to threaten, boast, brag.' Cf. brag as the name of a game, slam, also a game, and tramp, i.e. triumph. RUFFIAN. Cf. Walloon rouffian, a ruffian (Sigart). Certainly

RUMB. Spelt rombe in M. Blundevile, Exercises, 1594, fol. 331. 'Crooked lines, winding towards one of the poles, which lines are well knowne by the name of Rumbs;' L. Digges, Tectonicon, 1623, SABLE. 'Lettres enameld with sable and asure ;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 81 (1481). Sable and azure are the heraldic names for black and blue.

SAGO. Spelt sagu in 1608; N. and Q. 2 S. xii. 391. SALAD. So also Span. ensalada, salad, orig, herbs dressed with salt, oil, &c. The notion of seasoning with salt was orig. implied in salad, but in course of time it has come to pass that saling has very little to do with what it now implies. Cf. N. and Q. 3 S. x. 178. SALAMANDER. Anglo-F. salamandre, Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, 1, 660.

BALARY. Anglo-F. salarie, Liber Albus, p. 48. BALMON. Anglo-F. saumun, pl., Life of Edw. Conf. II. 21 20, 2178 (cf. E. salmon as a pl. form); also salmuns, pl., Gaimar's Chron.

BALT-CELLAR. The M.E. saler precisely answers to the Anglo-F. saler, a salt-cellar, Liber Custumarum, p. 461. SALTIER. In the Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. fol. f 5, we find M.E. saltory, O.F. saultier, and Lat. saltatorium, all meaning saltier.' This proves the etymology. SANCTUARY. Anglo-F. saintuarie, Stat. of the Realm, i. 298, SARDINE (2), a gem. Cf. Anglo-F. sardines, pl., sardine-stones, Gaimar's Chron. 4888.

SAUNTER. We find these examples — Thoo sawes schall rewe hym sore For all his saunteryng sone; York Mysteries, p. 351, l. 69. 'Nowe all his gaudis nothyng hym gaynes, His sauntering schall with bale be bought;' id. p. 354, l. 150. The dialect is Northern; the word seems to mean 'venturesomeness.'

SAWYER. Spelt sawiar, Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811,

p. 272. SAXIFRAGE. M. E. sasifrage, Book of St. Albans, fol. a 5, back, l. 2. We find O. F. saxifrage, Low Lat. saxifragium, in a Bloss of the 13th cent., in Wright's Voc. p. 140, 1. 7. BCALE (1). For A.S. scale, cf. 'Giumula, scale, hule, egle,' SCARCE. Anglo-F. escars, niggard, sparing, Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, 1. 602; cf. escarcete, scarcity, Polit. Songs, p. 186 (before 1307)

SCARF (1). We find the form sharpe (representing F. escharpe), A.D. 1439; Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 117, l. 8. SCHEDULE. Spelt scedull in the Will of Lady Margaret (1508); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 365. The Anglo-F. cedule occurs

SCION. So too soun in Wyclif, Ps. 79. 12. BCORCH. Perhaps (Scand.). I do not feel sure that the etymology given at p. 532 is wrong. The chief difficulty is that pointed out by Wedgwood, that the derivation from the French does not explain the M.E. words scorened and scorkle, which seem to be related. If they are unrelated, I may be right; otherwise, we must take them into account, in which case we are led, as I think, to a Scand. original. Scorened occurs in the Orniulum, 8626: 'For patt te land wass drijjedd all, And scorrenedd purth be druhhpe." 'Scorkelyn, ustulo' and 'Scorklyd, ustillatus' occur in the Prompt. Parv. Wedgwood cites a passage from Chaucer's tr. of Boethius in which the word scorclitk occurs; but this is only the passage which I have cited already, in which the best MSS. read scorekip; though the printed editions have skorelith, which is the spelling given by Richardson. Now it is obvious that scork-le is a frequentative form, whilst score-nen contains the suffix -na so common in Scandinavian; we are thus led to expect a Teutonic, and in particular a Scand. origin. This may, I think, be found in the strong Norweg. verb skrökka, to shrink, become wrinkled up, more com-monly spelt skrökka, pt. t. skrökk or skrokk, pp. skrokket, whence the adj. skrokken, shrunk up, evidently originally a strong pp., which actually produced the verb skrokkna, to be shrivelled up, the exact equivalent of the M. E. scorc-n-en. Similarly, the Swed. dial. skrdkkla, to wrinkle, corresponds to scork-le. Numerous related forms are given under Shrug and Sorag, which see. The verb to shrink has a in the pt. tense (cf. scrag), and u in the pp. (cf. skrug); the nk becomes kk in Norwegian and Danish, as usual. Then the kk is weakened to gg or g; and this at once accounts for the Low G. (Osnabrück) schröggen, to scorch, singe, given in the Bremen Wörterbuch, iv. 698, where we also learn that schröggen was fur-ord with O. F. escorcher. confu

4 score æcere,' eight score acres, in the MS. containing the Rule of St. Bennet in Corp. Chr. Coll. Oxon., fol. 108.

SCRAMBLE. Scrabble for scramble occurs in the Pilgrin's Progress. We also find scribble in the sense of a hasty walk. See extracts in Davies, Supp. Glossary.

SCREW. It has been shewn that E. screw is from O.F. escroue, a screw, orig. used of the hole in which the male screw works. Also that the O. F. escroue answers in form to the Lat. acc. scroben, a ditch, groove. All that is now needed is to supply the train of thought which connects screw with Lat. scrobs. This I can now do. The explanation is that the Low Lat. scrobs was particularly used of the hole made by swine when routing up the ground; so that screwing was, originally, the boring action of these animals. 'Hic scrobs, Anglice, a swyn-wrotyng;' Wright's Voc. i. 271, col. 1, last line ; and see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 99, note 11.

SCROLL. Actually spelt escroll in Guillim, Display of Heraldry (1664), p. 400. See also Escrow (above, p. 802). We find Anglo-F. escrouet, Stat. of the Realm, i. 190, an. 1322. This word only differs from escrou-el in the form of the dimin. suffix.

SCULLERY. Cf. Anglo-F. scuiler, a washer of dishes, Life of Edw. Conf. 1. 992. This is merely M. E. squiller (= swiller) turned into apparent French. The etymology already given is strongly confirmed by the actual use of scullery in the sense of off-scourings. 'The black pots among which these doves must lie, I mean the soot and shullery of vulgar insolency;' Gauden, Tears of the Church, 1659, p. 258. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

SCUPPER. Perhaps (F.,-L). The derivation of O.F. escopir from Lat. exspuere is not to be too lightly rejected. Cihac explains the Wallachian scuip-ire from exspuere, which he supposes became scupere, transposed for (e)c-spuere; the sense answers exactly. He instances the remarkable Port. form cuspir (also cospir), to spit, which is certainly from Lat. conspuere. For an early example of the word, cf. 'That gushes from out our galleys' scupper-holes;' J. Marston, Antonio and Mellida, i. I. 13 (1602).

SCUTTLE (3). Cf. 'How the misses did huddle, and scuddle, and run!' Anstey, New Bath Guide, letter 13 (Davies). Davies also gives scutter, a hasty, noisy run; scuttering, a hasty pace. *SEAM (2), a horse-load. (Low L., -Gk.) 'A scame of corn, eight bushels; a scam of wood, an horse-load;' Ray's Gloss., E. D.

S., B. 16. M. E. seem, P. Plowman, B. iv. 38. A. S. seám; occurring, e.g., in the comp. seám-pending, a load-penny, toll for a load, Thorpe, Diplomat. Ævi Saxonici, p. 138, l. 13. Not a Teut. word, but borrowed (like G. saum) from Low Lat. sauma, salma, corrupt forms of sagma, a pack, horse-load.-Gk. σάγμα, a pack-saddle. See further under Sumptor (where a notice of seam should have been inserted). See Weigand, s. v. Saum.

SEARCH. Cf. Anglo F. sercher, Stat. of the Realm, i. 274, an. 1335; earlier cercher, id. 219, an. 1384. Thus the initial c became s in Anglo-French, and we find the spelling sercher in the very book (Langtoft's Chron. i. 112) which Rob. of Brunne translated. Cf. selles, i. e. cells, in P. Plowman, B. pr. 28.

SEASON. The etymology given is verified by the occurrence of Anglo-F. seson in the express and limited sense of 'sowing-time.' Thus we find 'furment, segle, et mixtilon pur la seson yvernaille,' i.e. wheat, rye, and meslin [mixed corn] for the winter sowing; and 'feves, pois, et vesces pur la seson quaremele,' i.e beans, peas, and vetches for the Lent sowing; Will of Lady Clare (1355); see Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, pp. 34, 35. SECULAR. We find Anglo-F. seculer, Year-Books of Edw. I.

i. 59, 133. It may be noted here that the senses assigned to sense laris belong to late ecclesiastical Latin. The older sense was 'recurring at a saculum,' which was a stated period of considerable length.

SEISIN. Anglo-F. seisine, Stat. of the Realm, i. 36, an. 1275. See Beize, p. 539. SENIOR. The word occurs, spelt senyor, in The Monk of Evesham (ab. 1412), c. x., ed. Arber, p. 31. SENTINEL, SENTRY. I do not pretend to decide as to this difficult word, about which Scheler, Littre, and Diez differ. If we trust to the form, the most likely origin seems to be the Lat. sentina; for which reason I would remark that Lewis and Short cite a passage from Valerius Maximus, 2. 7. 1, in which senting has the sense of 'hangers-on of an army, camp-followers.' Wedgwood explains sentry from O.F. senteret, and sentinel from O.F. sentine, both in the sense of path, with allusion to the sentinel's beat. The objection is that the word is said, by Scheler, Littré, and Brachet, to be of Italian origin; Littre has no example earlier than the 1sth century.

SEPOY. Spelt in two ways in mod. F., viz. cipaye and spati.

SERAPH. See note in Cheyne's Isaiah, vi. 2: 'the popular notion of the Seraphim as angels is of course to be rejected.' It is the seraphim of Isaiah to be the same word as seraphim, 'burning in Numbers xxi. 6, so called from their burning bite. serpents A. L. M.

* SET (2). When we speak of 'a set of things,' this is a peculiar use of Sept, q.v. Not allied to the verb to set, in my opinion. A set = a swit; see Suit.

SEWER (1). Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, p. 355, points out another possible original for sewer, viz. O. F. seuwiere, a canal for conducting water (Roquefort). - Lat. ex-aquaria, i.e. that which conducts water out. - Lat. ex, out; and aquaria, fem. of aquarius, belonging to water, adj., from aqua, water. This is a highly probable solution, for the Lat. aqua became rue in O. Fr., and the Lat. aquaria is precisely E. ewer; so that s-ewer = ex-ewer; see Ewer. We actually find Anglo-F. Ewere, i.e. water-bearer, as a proper name, in ¶ Mr. Palmer misunderstands F. evier, a sink, which he wrongly supposes to be the same word ; but, as Scheler points out, évier (though formerly miswritten esvier, as in Cotgrave) is merely the same word as E. ewer (or sever without the s.), being derived from O. F. eve, water, another form of the word which in mod. F. appears as eas. The remarkable Anglo-F. form assence, dried up, in the Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 417, can hardly be anything else than = F. assuyé; which shews how nearly forms resulting from exaquaria and from ensucare may resemble each other. See prov. E. assue (Halliwell).

SEXTON. The change of a into e already appears in the Anglo-F. secrestein, Life of Edw. Conf. 1. 1998.

SHAD. The A.S. form is properly sceadd; the form sceadda is the gen. pl., and occurs in Thorpe, Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, p. 544. SHALLOON. Anglo-F. Chalouns, Chalons, cloth of Chalons, Liber Albus, pp. 225, 231. Chalons took its name from the tribe of the Catalauni.

SHALLOT. Rather (F., -L., -Gk., - Phoenician.). Spelt shalot in Phillips, ed. 1706; see F. échalote in Littré. Closely allied to scallion, from O. F. escalone, eschaloigne (given by Littré under échalote). These forms answer to Low Lat. ascolonium, given in the Epinal Glossary, but better spelt ascalonium. - Gk. 'Ασκάλων, the name of a Philistine city called in Heb. 'Ashqalon. See Scallion.

SHAM. In North's Examen, 1740, p. 256, he mentions 'a pure and pute sham-plot;' where pute represents Lat. putus. Again, at p. 231, he says: 'This term of art, sham-plot, should be decyphered. The word sham is true cant of the Newmarket breed. It is contracted of ashamed. The native signification is a town lady of diversion in country maid's cloaths, who, to make good her disguise, pretends to be so 'sham'd. Thence it became proverbial, when a maimed lover was laid up, or looked meager, to say he had met with a sham. But what is this to plots? The noble Captain Dangerfield, being an artist in all sorts of land piracy, translated this word out of the language of his society to a new employment he had taken up of false plotting. And as with them, it ordinarily signifies any false or counterfeit thing, so, annexed to a plot, it means one that is fictitious and untrue; and being so applied in his various writings and sworn depositions . . . it is adopted into the English language. β. We must here distinguish between fact and guess. North's explanation, that sham is short for asham'd, is a guess which I do not believe. On his own shewing the phrase ran, that a man had 'met with a sham,' i. e. with a shame or disgrace, hence, a trick, and, finally, 'any false or counterfeit thing,' to use North's words. This is at once a simpler and a more intelligible explanation, and agrees with all the other evidence, as I have already shewn. 'He [Sir R. L'Estrange] gave himself the trouble to print, in a quarto pamphlet, entitled The Shammer shammed, 1681, the whole transaction adorned with all the circumstances; North's Examen, 1740, p. 271. The 'meal-tub' plot, in relation to which Dangerfield appeared as a witness, took place in 1680. Note that the word occurs in Wycherley's Plain Dealer, A. iii. sc. 1, where the verb to sham simply means to shame or mock: 'I'm sure you joked upon me, and shammed me all night long.' This play was brought out in 1677, and written as early as 1665; we thus have an example earlier than anything to which North refers SHAMMY, SHAMOY. So again, Cotgrave explains F. ysard as 'the shamois, or wild goat, of whose skin chamois leather is made.' Coles (1684) gives the same account. The G. gemsenleder, chamois leather, is clearly from gemse, chamois, and not from Samland.

SHAWM. The pl. forms shalmouse, shalmoyses, in Caxton, tr. of Reynard, ed. Arber, p. 54, l. 15, and p. 112, l. 30, answer to the F. pl. chalumeaux.

SHE. A curious correction is needed here. Though the A.S.

of mythical origin, orig. denoting serpent forms. Cheyne considers $ sed was used as the fem. of se, it really took its origin from a slightly different form. In Skt. we not only find sa, fem. ss (Benfey, p. 981), but another form syas, that, fem. syá, neut. tyad (p. 376). Now the fem. sá is the same as Gk. 1, Goth. so, Icel. sú; but the fem. syá is the same as O. H. G. siu, mod. G. sie, O. Icel. sjá, A. S. seo, mod. E. she. It is remarkable that Icelandic has both forms sú and siá (the latter being obsolete). Hence E. she is the fem. of an Aryan form SA-YA, a demonstrative form compounded of the two Arvan demonst. forms SA and VA. For the latter, see Yon.

SHED (1). I find that the alleged A.S. sceddan, to shed, is given by Mätzner. In his Grammar, he cites A.S. sceddan, pt. t. scood, sceood, pp. scaden, to shed, which he says was confused in M.E. with A.S. sceidan, to sever. All this is pure assumption, and rests upon Ettmüller, who assumes the form sceddan for his own purposes. He grounds it upon the phrase 'to scedende blod,' to shed blood, occurring as a various reading in Ps. xiii. 16, ed. Spelman ; this is assumed to be miswritten for sceddende = sceddanne, whereas it may very well be quite right, and = sceadanne. Next he assumes that the pt. t. is scod, though scod is only found with the totally unconnected sense of 'injured,' and is rightly regarded by Grein as the pt. t. of sceadan, to scathe or injure. Both these assumptions are made with the object of forcing a c nnection between E. shed and G. schütten, to shed, of which the orig. sense was to shake, and to which the related E. word is Shudder, q. v. Even then, when Ettmüller has constructed this A.S. verb after his own plan, he has further to assume a root-verb scudan, in order to get over the difference in the vowel-sound between shed and shudder. The whole is very su-picious, and the only real point of connection between these verbs is such as is afforded by O. Fries. schedda, to shake violently. The necessary conclusion is, that one or other of the following views must be true. Either shed, in the sense to spill or scatter, is the same word with shed, to part (A.S. sceadan), to which I see no objection, for the phr. 'to scedende blod,' cited above, tells this way rather than the other; or else shed, to spill, is a different word, and had the original sense of 'shake,' being connected with O. Fries. schedda, from a base SKAD, to shake, of which I can find no trace beyond a possible connection with the base SKUD, to shake, for which see Shudder. With the A.S. sceadan, to part, we may also further compare O. Sax. skédan, O. Fries. skétha, scéda, to part. It is also highly material to observe that the verb to shed, in the sense 'to separate,' though originally a strong verb, is formed with the weak pt. t. shadde and the weak pp. shad as early as in the Ormulum; see 11. 3200, 4939. The very same forms have the sense of 'split' in P. Plowman, B. xvii. 288, &c. B. But the most material point is to observe the change of sense. We have A.S. sceadan, to part ; M.E. sheeden (pt. t. shadde), to part, Ormulum, 1209, 3200; but the verb became intransitive, so that, in Layamon, 5187, we have 'redde blod scede (or sadde), red blood spread abroad, or was shed. Lastly, it again became transitive in a new sense, as in Layamon, 7650, where we have 'one blodes drope sadds,' he shed a drop of blood. This is the real key to the whole matter.

SHED (2). I find no older quotation for this word in the modern sense than the following : 'Sheds stuff'd with lambs and goats, distinctly kept;' Chapman, tr. of Homer's Odyssey, ix. 314. We find also prov. E. shade, a shed for fuel (East Yorksh.), cow-shade, a cow-shed (Leicestershire), E. D. S. Gloss. B. 2 and B 5; Shropsh. shad. a shed. These forms are sufficient to justify my inference, that shed is a mere variant of skade. B. But there is also a prov. E. skud, a shed (E. D. S. B. 3); this is M. E. schudde, a shed (Prompt Parv.). It is of Scand. origin; cf. Swed. skydd, protection. skydda, to protect, shelter; from the same root as Sky, q.v.  $\gamma$ . Thus, whilst on the one hand, the  $\checkmark$  SKA, to cover, is the source of shade and shed. on the other hand the closely allied & SKU, to cover, is the source of shud.

SHEET-ANCHOE. The spelling shootanker occurs also in Roister Doister, i. 1. 28. The spelling of sheet-ancheor is due to M.E. scheten, to shoot. See remarks already made, s. v. Sheet, and see Shoot.

SHELTER. We actually find the corrupt form jeltron, but used in the sense of 'shield' or 'shelter,' in Hickscorner; Dodsley's Old Plays, i. 149. This links shelter with M.E. sheltroun, past all question.

SHERRY. The name of the Spanish town is spelt both Xerez and Sherris on the same page (A. D. 1626); see An English Garner, ed. Arber, i. 632; also Sherries, id. i. 621.

•SHILLELAGH, an oaken stick used as a cudgel. (Irish). The Rejected Addresses (Living Lustres, st. 9). Named from Shille-lagh, a barony in Wicklow famous for oaks. The Irish name Siol-Elaigh means 'the descendants of Elach.' - Irish siol, seed, descendants; and Elack, proper name. See Joyce, Irish Local Names. The O. Irish sil, seed, is from  $\sqrt{SA}$ , to sow; Fick. i. 789.

SHINGLE. 'Their haven is so ... often stopped up with beach escremisse, from Gautier de Coinsi, liv. i. ch. 10. This settles the and shingle stone, '&c. (A.D. 1614); Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 338. [As the English Garner has modernised spelling, we cannot tell what was the spelling of the original here.]

SHITTAH. Heb. tt for nt, which is quite regular; cf. Arab. sant, a thorn, an acacia; Rich. Dict. p. 853. Of Egyptian origin; from Egypt. schonle; Gesenius, ed. 8, p. 830. The acacia is called the spina Aegyptia. So in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.—A. L. M. SHOAL (1). Cf. 'a Scoll of Fysh;' Book of St. Albans, fol. f7,

SHOG. The pp. schoggid, i. e. shaken about, occurs as early as in Wyclif, Matt. xiv. 24. See schoggyn in Prompt. Parv. SHOVEL. Oldest spelling scool, in the 8th century. 'Vatilla, tsern scool,' i. e. iron shovel, Wright's Voc. ii. 123, col. 1. Cf. 'Batilla, fyr-scoff,' i. e. fire-shovel, id. ii. 11, col. 1. SHY. The verb exactly answers to Swed. sky, to shun.

SIBYL. Prof. Postgate takes Sibulla to be from a stem oiB-vlo-, with a fem. suffix -ya. He remarks that the root would appear to be σιβ-; cf. persibus in Festus, who has : 'callidus sive acutus, persibus;' from the  $\sqrt{SAP}$ , to be wise, seen in Lat. sapere, GK. so  $\sqrt{sa}$ . Thus Sibyl would mean 'the wise woman,' or perhaps 'the little wise woman;' so named because she knows the secrets of destiny. I may add that this etymology agrees with the fact that F. sage can only be derived from sabius, not from sapius ; see Sage (1).

SIEGE. The Anglo-F. forms are both siege, Liber Custumarum, p. 140, and sege, Gaimar's Chron. 1. 3110.

*SIESTA, orig, a noon-day nap. (Span., -L.) 'What, sister, at your siesta already?' Elvira, in Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xv. 22. Now usually applied to a nap in the afternoon. - Span. siesta, 'the hottest part of the day, the time for taking a nap after dinner, generally from 1 to 3 o'clock ;' Neuman. - Lat. sexta, i.e. sexta kora, sixth hour, noon; reckoning from 6 A.M.; so that the orig. sense was 'noonday nap.' Sexta is fem. of Lat. sextus, sixth. - Lat. sex, six; see Six. For a shifting of time in the reverse direction, see Noon. SIGNET. Spelt signett, Mandeville's Trav. p. 82. Anglo-F. signet, Royal Wills, p. 80 (1361).

SILK. It is suggested by Slavonic scholars that the change of the r of sericum into l took place on Slav ground. The Russ. form is shelks (sholk); [cf. Lithuan. szilkai, silk, silkai, cotton]. It is probable that silk became known to the Scandinavians and Saxons through Slavonic traders.—A. L. M.

SIMPLETON. Mr. Palmer suggests that simpleton is short for simple-tony, the word tony having much the same meaning, of 'foolish We find the line : 'I think a simple-tony,' introduced into fellow.' a song (about A. D. 1772?), where a rime for macaroni is required; and again: 'A bow from any tony' in another song, in which every verse ends with macaroni; both are quoted in Chambers, Book of Days, ii. 32. Prior, in his poem 'The Mice,' written in 1708, intro-duces the line: 'Home went, well pleas'd, the Suffolk tony.' Cf. Tony (i. e. Anthony) Lumpkin in Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer. On the other hand, it may be that simple-tony is merely an extended form of simpleton, and that tony is short for it. At present, the evidence points this way, since simpleton is used by L'Estrange, who died in 1704; and examples of eion at the end of F. words are given in N. and Q. vi. 8. 132; e.g. caneton, molleton, hanneton. Cf. Span. simplon, a simpleton; Ital. semplicione, a simpleton.

SIMULATE. The sb. symulacyon occurs in The Monk of Evesham (ab. 1482), c. 36; ed. Arber, p. 79. SINGLE. The M. E. form sengle (P. Plowm. A. x. 200) is from F. sengle (Cot.); but single is from Latin, or is a form adapted to the Lat. spelling.

SIRE. Anglo-F. sire, Polit. Songs, p. 232 (before 1307); and in the Vie de St. Auban.

SIREN. See 'A Philological Examination of the Myth Sirens," by J. P. Postgate, in the Journal of Philology (Cambridge), vol. ix. The conclusion is that siren meant orig. 'a bird,' and that the root is VSWAR, to sound. This confirms what I have already said.

SIZE (1). The expression 'feet of assize,' i. e. statutable feet, feet of a fixed length, occurs in a [late?] copy of the Will of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 295. This throws much light on the word.

SIZE (2). Cf. 'syse for colours, colle de cuir; ' Palsgrave. It occurs even in the 15th cent., being spelt cyse in Reliq. Antiq. i. 108.

SKIRMISH. Cf. Anglo-F. eskermir, to fence, Lib. Custumarum, p. 282. The suffix is not really due to the sb., as said at p. 558, but the verb is derived (regularly) from the base eskermiss- of the pres. part., &c.; just as is the case with ban-ish, pol-ish, and the like. Thus, Littré quotes the pr. pl. escremissent from Roncisvals, p. 6; and the same form occurs in Le Roman de Rou, in Bartsch, Chrest. 1. 28. Roquefort also gives the pres. sing. subj.

*SKUA, a bird, a kind of gull. (Scand.) 'Lestris cataractes, the common skua;' Engl. Encycl. s.v. Larida. Apparently a corruption of Icel. skufr, a skua; also called skumr, 'the skua, or brown gull;' Icel. Dict. I suppose the reference is to the colour; cf. Icel. shame, shade, dusk; Swed. shum, dusky; Norweg. shum, dull, dusky, chiefly used of the weather, but sometimes of colour. Perhaps allied to Sky

SLAB (1). Wedgwood objects to my explanation of slab as 'a smooth piece,' though this is certainly what we mean by a slab of stone. He says: 'it corresponds exactly to Languedoc exclapo, a chip, slab of wood or unworked stone, from esclapa, to split wood;' and he further compares F. éclater, to fly into fragments. This makes no difference to the etymology; we may regard slab as meaning merely 'slip' or 'slice,' and it comes to the same result. The Languedoc esclape, to split, is clearly of Teutonic origin, from the O. Du. slippen, which (as I have already said) means 'to slit' as well as 'to slip'; precisely as F. delat and E. slate are derived from the O. H. G. equivalent of slit; see Slate. The notion of slitting appears also in sliver and slice. SLAVE, sect.  $\beta$ . The name Slave meant, in Slavonic, not 'the glorious,' but 'the intelligible,' or more literally, 'the speaking' people; like other races, they regarded their neighbours as 'barba-rian' or 'dumb.' Similarly 'the Poles called their neighbours, the Germans, Niemiee, niemy meaning dumb; just as the Greeks called the barbarians Aglossoi, or speechless; Max Müller, Lect. on Lang., 8th ed., i. 97. Accordingly, the derivation of Slove (or rather, of O. Russ. Slovéne, Slavonians, given in Thomsen's Relations between ancient Russia and Scandinavia, p. 8) is from the Church-Slav. slow, a word (cf. Russ. slovo, Pol. slowo, a word). Still, it hardly disturbs the etymology; for it happens that the Church-Slav. slava, fame, and slovo, a word, are closely allied words, both being connected with Church-Slav. slu-ti, to be named, to be illustrious; from

SLIEEVELESS. We see, by Richardson's Dict., that the phr.
'sleuelesse words' occurs in the Test. of Love, b. ii. (see Chauce's Works, ed. 1561), fol. 302, col. i; also 'sleeveless rhymes' occurs in Bp. Hall, Sat. iv. 1, 34; and 'a slowless reson' in Reliquize Antique, i.  $3_3$  (15th cent.). The explanation turns on some old joke, such as I have indicated. The pretence that it is 'a corruption' is mere pedantry.

SLEIGH. The pl. scleyes occurs in Mandeville's Travels, p. 130. Possibly a F. modification of the Du, or Dan. word. Cf. E. Fries.

side or sidede, a sledge. SILENDER. Not (O. Low G.), but (F., -O. Low G.). It is derived from O. F. esclendre, slender, given by Palsgrave as the F. form of 'sklender.' This at once accounts for the former vowel, as well as for the curious M. E. selender, Mandeville's Travels, p. 290, selendre, Chaucer, C. T., Group A, 587. It is the O. F. esclembre that is derived from the O. Du. slinder. We thus account for the vowel-change; in regularly becomes en in French, as in en = Lat. in. sengle from Lat. singulum, &c.

*SLEUTH-HOUND. Explained under Slot (2)

SLOUGH (2). 'A slughe, squama; slughes of eddyrs [snakes],

I insert this ridiculous word because a certain critic believed it to be worth insertion, and remarked upon the 'fine opportunity' for explaining its connection with slawgheer'. As a fact, Browning's line: 'Dauntless the slag-horn to my lips I set' (Childe Roland, near the end) is amusing to an editor of Chatterton, who recognises the original of it in 'Some caught a slag-horn, and an onset wound;' Battle of Hastings, pt. ii. st. 10. Unluckily, a slug-horn is not a horn at all; it is merely a spelling, in the edition of G. Douglas which Chatterton consulted, of the word which in Small's edition (iii. 126, l. 29) is better spelt slogorne; see slughorne or sloggorne in Jamieson's Scot. Dict. Slogorne is merely an old spelling of slogan, and means a battle-cry. It will now be understood that I have already inserted and explained it;

see p. 563. SMACK (3). Latinised as esnecca in the Pipe Roll, 2 Rich. I

SOCK. A better quotation for the A.S. word, shewing its early adoption from Latin, is the following. 'Soccus, soc, sleve-scok, i.e. sock, slip-shoe; Wright's Voc. ii. 120, col. 2 (8th century). SOFT. I see Weigand is of opinion that the G. sackt was merely borrowed from Low G. sagt, soft, which is allied to Dn. zacht, Dan. sagte, soft. If these words are to be connected with E. saft, as he supposes, I think it must be due to the substitution of a gutturnl sound for f, of which we have instances in the Du. luckt th century, praises this vegetable in Arabic words which Devic quotes; (for luft), air, Du. krackt (for kraft), strength, &c. We may thus the name employed being al-isfandi. Richardson's Arab. Dict. gives account for the double form sanft and sackt in German, by supposing the former to be H.G. and the latter borrowed from Low G. We may still take the base to be SAF-, as seen in the A.S. and O. Sax. forms, the most likely form of the root being SWAP, as already said. Cf. Icel. sof-a, to sleep (pt. t. svaf).

SOIL (1). Cf. Anglo-F. soil, land, Year-Books of Edw. I. iii.

SOOTHE. 'That's as much as to say you would tell a monstrous . . . lie, and I shall sooth it,' i.e. I am to bear witness to its truth; Faire Em, Act. iii. sc. 11; in Simpson's School of Shakespeare, ii. 443, l. 866. 'What better way than this? To sooth his purpose and to draw him on With expectation;' Play of Stucley, 1. 1516; id. i. 219.

SÖRCERESS. Anglo-F. sorceresse, French Chron. of London,

i. 51, l. 7. *SPADE (at cards). (Span., -L., -Gk.). The name spade is really a substitution for the Spanish name espada, meaning (1) a sword, (2) a spade at cards; compare the etymology of spadille, given at p. 577, col. 1, 1. 9, and see ll. 2-5 just above. The Spanish cards have swords for spades; see Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, b. iv. c. 2, $ 20; Archæologia, viii. 135. SPALPEEN. 'The poor harvest-men who now pass in troops from Ireland to England are now called spalpeens, with a show of contempt or disrespect in using the word,' &c. MS. written ab. 1740, cited in N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 307; q. v. And see under Buckeen in Davies, Suppl. Glossary. SPANGLE. Spangis, spangles, occurs in the Kingis Quhair, by James I. of Scotland, st. 47.

SPARK (1). In sparkle, verb, the suffix may be frequentative. It is difficult to be certain whether sparkle, verb, is from the sb., or was formed as a frequentative.

SPAWN. The etymology from O. F. espandre or espaundre is rendered certain by a gloss in Wright's Voc. i. 164. We there find: 'Soffret le peysoun en ewe espaundre,' i. e. let the fish spawn in the water; espaundre being glossed (in the MS.) by scheden his roune, i.e. shed his roe, though it is misprinted scheden him frome. Hence the word is certainly (F.,-L.). So in N. and Q. 6 S. v. 465 (by myself).

SPELL (1). 'Relatu, spelli;' Wright's Voc. ii. 118 (8th cent.).

SPELL (2). I have already pointed out the confusion between this word and spell (4), a splinter of wood, owing to the use of a piece of wood as a pointer in schools. Wedgwood argues that spell (2) is, in fact, nothing but a mere derivative of spell (4), and that the A.S. spellian, to declare, relate, may as well be left out of the question. I will not contest this, as it is probable enough; only, in that case, we must assume that M. E. speld, a splinter, took the form spell, ld becoming ll by assimilation. Cf. O. Du. spelle, a pin (Hexham) with Du. speid, a pin, which is still in use, though really an older form; and see Spill (2). Under Spell (2), I have cited Cotgrave as using the curious form speale; this (as Wedgwood well points out) is clearly derived from the old word speal, a splinter of wood (Halliwell), and is of Scand. origin; from Swed. spjäla, a splinter, which is ultimately from the same root.

SPINACH, SPINAGE. Rather (F., - Span., - Arab., - Pers.). Littré gives O. F. espinace, which (rather than Ital spinace), is the origin of the E. word. - Span. espinaca, spinach. See a remarkable article in Devic, Supp. to Littré, p. 33, s. v. épinard. He shews (conclusively, as it appears to me) that the almost universally accepted etymology from Lat. spina is wrong. He cites Jean Bauhin, a botanist of the 16th century, as deriving the word from Hispanicum olus, which points to the Span. origin of the F. word, but is really a mere coincidence; Bauhin adds (what is more important) that no ancient authors mention spinach, except the Arabs, who call it hispanac. The reference is to Bauhin, Histor. Plantarum Univers. ii. 964. Far earlier testimony exists; for Razi, in the 9th | i. 339, an. 1353.

the name employed being al-isfánáj. Richardson's Arab. Dict. gives isfánáj, isfánáj, aspanákk, all meaning 'spinage'; pp. 90, 75. He considers them as Greek words, from Gk.  $\sigma$ πινάκια, but this is a mere modern word, really derived from the Arabic. Devic further cites a quotation in Littré to shew that the spinack came to Spain from the East, and adds that it has been shewn that the plant is indigenous in Persia; for which see G. A. Olivier, Voyage dans l'empire ottoman, 1802. We conclude that the name was introduced into Spain by the Moors, and that the Arab. name was prob. originally Persian. The fact that the suffix -ij is already found in Arabic in the 9th century is strongly against the possibility of its Being due to the Lat. -accus. SPINET. Spelt espinette (the F. form) in Pepys' Diary, July 15,

SPLAY. So also: 'Here colere splayed,' her collar displayed;

Cov. Myst. p. 242. SPRAY (1). This seems to be a word of such late use, that it can hardly be originally English. Moreover, the A.S. geondsprégan is a very doubtful word; it may be a mistake for geondsprengan. I suspect the word will turn out to be a derivative from Du. spreiden, to spread, scatter, strew. The loss of d between two vowels is not uncommon in Du. and Low G.; the Bremen Wörterbuch gives spreën, spreien as varying forms of spreden. Aasen notes that the Norweg. spreida, to spread, is in some places pronounced as spreie. The d has also disappeared in the derived Low G. sprei (also sprede), a spreading out of flax to dry, Du. sprei, that which is spread on a bed, a coverlet. If this be right, spray is related to spread rather than to sprinkle. The word occurs in Bailey, ed. 1745. SPROUT. Cf. Walloon sprot, sprawt, a term applied to cabbagesprouts (Sigart). SPRUCE. Prussia was called Sprucia by the English as late as A.D. 1614; see Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 329, 345. 'Sprace canuas' is mentioned in Arnold's Chron. (1502), repr. 1811, p. 236. SPURT. 'A short spurt doth not tire me;' A. Tuckney, Sermon

SPURT. 'A short spurt doth not tire me; 'A. Fuckney, Sermon on Balm of Gilead, p. 65; N. and Q. 2 S. viii. 7. SQUIRREI. We find Anglo-F. esquireus, esquireux, plural forms from a sing. esquirel, in Liber Albus, pp. 225, 231. This is a modification of O. F. escurel.

STANDARD. In 1392, we find the expression 'un rouge lit estendard,' supposed to mean 'a red standing bed, i.e. one whose tester rested on pillars'; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 131. This again points to the etymology suggested.

STAG. The word seems to have been English; A. S. stagga. In the Laws of Cnut, De Foresta, § 24, we read of 'regalem feram, quam Angli staggon [read staggan] appellant.' STANK. The dialectic form of F. whence the E. sb. is derived

sita, 451; estanke, Lib. Albus, p. 505. STANNARY. The Corn. staen, W. ystaen, &c., are borrowed from Latin (Rhŷs).

STAVE. Mr. Cockayne remarks that 'the A.S. staf, G. buckstab, a letter, refers to the characters standing in rows. Staves of a psalm are appropriate because there is a row of them; Spoon and Sparrow, p. 134. Runic characters or staves resemble a row of upright sticks.

STEM (3). Mr. Palmer observes that ' to stem the waves,' being formed from the sb. stem (of a vessel), is a distinct word from 'to stem a torrent.' In a very strict sense, it is so. But I have given them together, because both verbs are derivatives from stem, sb. This sb. has two senses, but one of them is secondary. To 'stem the waves' is from stem (2); to 'stem a torrent' is from stem (1);

STENCIL. Anglo-F. estencille, pp., Langtoft's Chron. ii. 430. STINGY. Cf. also Shropsh. stinge, a grudge; as, 'I owed 'im a stinge;' Shropsh. Wordbook. STOP. Cf. Anglo-F. estoper, to stop up, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 23; estuper, Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, I. 784. The latter form is obviously from Low Lat. stupare.

STORE. The derivation from Lat. instaurare is further shewn by the occurrence of instore. 'All his lande instored of husbondry and of all other thingis;' Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 215. STRAPPADO. E. Webbe, according to his Travels (1590), ed.

Arber, p. 31, had practical experience of it at Naples. 'Thrice had I ye strappado, hoisted vp backward with my hands bound behinde me, which strook all the joynts in my armes out of joynt." STRIPLING. M. E. stripling, Mandeville's Trav. p. 278.

STURGEON. Anglo-F. sturioun, Lib. Albus, p. 382.

SUBDUE. Cf. Anglo-F. subdwz, pp. subdued, Stat. of the Realm, ed. Nicolas, p. 286. TRELLIS. The Lat. trichila may be from the same source as E.

tress. See tresse in Scheler.

TRICK (1). The assumed loss of initial s is proved also by the occurrence of A.S. trica and strica, both in the same sense of mark or stroke. 'Caracteres, trican, mærcunge;' Mone, Quellen, p. 388. 'An strica,' i. e. one stroke, Judges xv (at end).

TRICKLE. Yet another instance. 'Teres trekyl downe be my face ; ' Cov. Myst. p. 72. TRIGGER. Spelt tricker in Farquhar, Recruiting Officer, i. I

TRIPOS. Cf. 'Wits, .. who never, certainly, were at all inspired from a Tripus's, Terra-filius's, or Prævarecator's speech;' Eng. Garner, vii. 267 (1670). Note that tripos is bad spelling for tripus (i. e. Tpittous).

TRIVET. Cf. Anglo-F. trepez, pl. ( = trepets), trivets, Havelok, 1. 1017

TRON. Anglo-F. trone, Lib. Custumarum, p. 63; Lib. Albus,

TROW. Anglo-F. trong, Lib. Custumarum, p. 03; Lib. Albus, p. 246; whence tronage, Lib. Albus, pp. 226, 245. TROY-WEIGHT. The following early example occurs A.D. 1438. 'Euery cuppe weynge a mark and a half of Troye;' The Fifty Earliest English Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 111, l. 10. In the Will of Card. Beaufort, we find the expression 'de pondere Troiano'; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 326. This clearly points to a place-name as the option of the word the origin of the word.

TRUCE. The word even found its way into Anglo-French; the sing. trewe occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 300, an. 1344; the pl. appears as trues, triwes, trives, in Gaimar's Chron. 11. 567, 3042, 3046. So also, in the French Chron. of London (Camd. Soc.) we have le truve, p. 46, and les truves, p. 92. 'A true or peas' occurs as late as in Fabyan, ed. Ellis, p. 401, l. 4; but on p. 318 it is spelt treuce, and, on p. 625, treue. The F. treve, O. F. trive, is (similarly) from O. H. G. triwa, truth, faithfulness. TRUNK. The application of this word to the elephant's pro-boscis arose from a mistake. The F. name for it was trompe (see Cotgrave); which should have been adopted into English in the form trump. But owing to a confusion of sound, and want of clearness as to sense, the word trunk, with the notion of (hollow) stem, and hence 'tube,' was confused with trump, a trumpet, a tube. Thus Halliwell gives trunk and trump both with the sense of 'tube of a pea-shooter, and he further notes that trunk is sometimes corruptly used in the sense of a trump at cards.

TRYST. Cf. also M. E. tristre, a station in hunting, appointed place, Ancren Riwle, p. 332; allied to trist, trust, tristen, to trust. We still speak of 'a place of trust'; and the tristre was prob. so named because a trusty hunter was placed there. In Gawain and the Grene Knight, we find tryst, v., to trust, l. 380; and tryster, a hunting-station, l. 1712.

TURK. M. Pavet de Courteille, in his Dict. Turk-Oriental (or Tatar Dictionary), which has explanations in French, gives 'turk, Tatar Dictionary), which has explanations in French, gives 'turk, brave, rude;' p. 213. TURN. We even find A.S. tyrnan, so that the word was (at first) introduced directly from Latin. 'Rotunditate, tyrnincge;' Mone, Quellen, p. 342. 'Vertigo, tyrning,' id. 345. 'Rotantis, turniendre,' id. 345. But the M.E. tornen is French. TURNPIKE. It occurs early. Jamieson cites turn-pyk from Wyntown, viii. xxxviii. 74. In Boutell's Heraldry, figures no. 266 and 267 well illustrate the difference between a turnpike and a turnstile; in particular the former chews the reason for the name turnstile.

in particular, the former shews the reason for the name turnpike, inasmuch as its three horizontal bars resembled pikes, and terminated at one end in sharp points. TURPENTINE. M. E. turbentine, Mandeville's Trav. p. 51.

TURTLE (2). So also, in An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 121, we find that the islands called in Spanish Tortugas were called in English Tortles, 'because of the number of them which there do breed.' See also vii. 355, 357. For the Span. tortuga, see Tortoise. TUSK. The M. E. tusk occurs in the Cath. Anglicum, and in St. Juliana, p. 68, l. 13. It was prob. a Northern form, tusck or tusk being Southern. TUSSLE. Cf. 'to towsill me,' i.e. to pull me about; Rauf lif is given under Eleven (in the second edition).

UHLAN, ULAN. The word is certainly pure Turkish, and of Tatar youth Turk. is oglán, oglan (vulgarly ólan), a son, ker's Dict. p. 124. Cf. also ogul, ogúl, a of Tatar youth ord is oglan, a son, child; which was forson, towards the making of a new bell called trebyll; Testamenta Vetusta, I merly in use, among the Moguls, as a fitle of princes of the blood royal; Pavet de Courteille, Dict. Turk-Oriental, p. 68. Cf. also Tatar ogúl, son.

ULLAGE. 'Onofrier, in his Glossaire Lyonnais, commenting on the verb olier, ouiller, to fill to the brin, observes that in the South of France, when a flask is nearly full, they add a little oil instead of a cork to prevent evaporation, so that to oil a flask is equivalent to filling it to the brim. In Provence oliar signifies to anoint with oil, and also to fill up a cask.'-Wedgwood. And, in fact, we find in Cotgrave the following : 'oiellage de vins, the filling up of leaky wine-vessels ; oeiller les vins, to fill up wine-vessels which have leaked.

UNANELED. 'I aneele a sicke man, I anounte hym with holy oyle, Ienhuylle. I lefte hym so farre past, that he was houseled and aneeled;' Palsgrave. The word anele was also spelt anoil, by substitution of the F. form oil for the older A.S. form. See two examples in Davies, Supp. Glossary.

UNCLE. Anglo F. uncle, Gaimar's Chron. l. 188; Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 181.

UNION (2). Anglo-F. union, described by Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, 1482. M. E. uniune, Land of Cokaygne, l. 89. UNIVERSITY. Anglo-F. universite, Year-Books of Edw. I. iii.

UNLESS. Cf. 'But men of levyng be so owtrage, . . That, lesse than synne the soner swage, God wyl be vengyd,'&cc. I.e. on a less supposition than the supposition that men mend their ways, &c.; Coventry Mysteries, p. 40. This shews the idea involved. Here lesse than is short for on lesse than; and the modern unless that - on less than that.

UNRULY. In the Cath. Angl. (1483), we find: 'Rewly, tran-quillus,' and 'un-rewely, inquietus.' Also 'reule, regula;' and 'to reule, regulare.' The sense 'tranquil' may have been due to conreule, regulare.' The sense 'tranquil' may have been due to con-fusion with M. E. ro, rest; but the form of the word is due to 'reule, regula.' We find 'ruly and rightwise,' in the Destruction of Troy, l. 3888, where the sense seems to be 'orderly.' Cotgrave explains F. moderé by 'moderate, quiet, ruly, temperate, orderly.' UPSTART. Cf. also start-up, Much Ado, i. 3. 69. URCHIN. See note on Formidable (p. 806).

*USE (2), profit, benefit. (F.,-L.) When use is employed, in legal documents, in the special sense of 'benefit,' it is a modernised legal documents, in the special sense of benefit, it is a modernised spelling of the Anglo-F. form of the Lat. opus, employment, need. Cf. Anglo-F. oes, use, profit, Annals of Burton, pp. 474, 482, A.B. 1258; oeps, Liber Custumarum, p. 202; Statutes of the Realm, L 144, A.D. 1209; uces, service, Vie de St. Auban, 1554. A good example is the following: 'Que il feist a sun oes guarder,' which be caused to be kept for his own use; Roman de Rou, 2336. We find also Anglo-F. us, usage, use (from Lat. acc. usum), Year-Books of

Edw. I. i. 409. See oes, ues, eus, obs, in Bartsch. USHIER. Anglo-F. usser, Gaimar's Chron. II. 5982, 5995, 5999: spelt ussher, Lib. Custumarum, p. 475. The pl. Aus, doors, occurs in Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 23.

UTAS. Anglo-F. utaves, octaves, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 407; utavs, id. i. 75; octaves, Stat. of the Realm; i. 310. an. 1351. UTEINSIL. 'Alle pe vtensyl of myn hows;' Early E. Wills, ed.

Furnivall, p. 18, l. 10 (A.D. 1411).

VAMPIRE. 'Vampir, vampir, währwulf, blutsauger,' i. e. vampire, werwolf, blood sucker; Popović, Servian Dict. Cf. Russ.

vampir', Polish upior, upir. VANISH. Cf. Anglo-F. evaniz, pp., Life of Edw. Conf. 1. 3778. VANQUISH. Cf. Anglo-F. venquist, pt. tense sing., Havelok,

1. 948. VANTAGE. Anglo-F. vantage, advantage, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 200. VENIAL. O. F. venial (see Littré).

VENTAIL. M. E. ventaile (A.D. 1411); Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 19, l. 4; Anglo-F. ventaile, Langtoft, ii. 428.

VENUE. Anglo-F. venue, resort, Stat. of the Realm, i. 26, an. 1275; venue des justices, venue of the justices, id. i. 211, an. 1286.

VERANDA. 'The other gate leads to what in this country [India] is called a veranda or feranda, which is a kind of piazza or landing-place before you enter the hall or inner apartments;' Archizeologia, viii. 254 (1787). A very early instance; in Davies, Supp.

Glossary. VERB.

VERB. M. E. verbe (15th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 14. VERDICT. The Anglo-F. pl. verdiz (from sing. verdit) occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 212 (ab. 1286).

VERGE (1). Anglo-F. verge, a limit, Stat. of the Realm, i. 138, an. 1300.

VERIFY. Spelt veryfye, Cov. Myst. p. 122.

VETCH. Walloon vecke (Sigart).

VETERAN. Spelt veterane in Holinshed (or rather Stanihurst), $ (footnote), B. xx. 379 (footnote); &c. So too, in Old Plays, ed. Descr. of Ireland (1586), repr. 1808, vi. 226.

VIEW. We find the actual spelling view in Anglo-F., in Lib. Albus, p. 182; also vewe, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 67, 73; vue, Life of Edw. Conf. l. 2784.

VINTAGE. Anglo-F. vendenge, Stat. of the Realm, i. 331, an.

1353. VINTNER. Anglo-F. vineter (as a proper name), Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 301; M. E. vinter, A. D. 1435, Early E. Wills, ed. Fur-nivall, p. 103, l. 7. The mod. E. word certainly ought to have been vinter; whence the word Vintry (i.e. vinter-y) as the name of one of the London wards.

VISCOUNT. Our spelling is due to Anglo-F. visconte, the usual word for 'sheriff,' Stat. of the Realm, i. 28, an. 1275; spelt viscunte, Annals of Burton, p. 455; viscounte, Lib. Custumarum, p. 130; viconte, Year Books of Edw. I. i. 7. VISCOUS. Spelt viscose, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 90, l. 1. VISIBLE. The adv. visibely (sic) occurs in Mandeville's Trav.

P. 270. VIXEN. Cf. 'fixen hyd,' put for 'fyxen hyd,' i.e. fox's hide;

A. S. Leechdoms, i. 342. VOICE. We find the spelling voice in Anglo F., in Langtoft's Chron. i. 260; usually voiz, as in Life of Edw. Conf. l. 1487.

WAFEB. Anglo F. wafre, Lib. Custumarum, p. 473. WAGE, WAGES. Anglo F. wage, a prize, Langtoft's Chron. i. 222; pl. wages, wages, French Chron. of London, p. 83; gages, wages, Stat. of the Realm, i. 137, an. 1300. WAIF. Anglo-F. wayf, weif, Lib. Custumarum, pp. 434, 486, 151; in the Life of Edw. Conf. l. 3204, waif signifies 'a man who has strayed.

WAINSCOT. The earliest example of the use of the word is in the Liber Albus, p. 238, where it is spelt weynscotte. In a number of Taalstudie, 1883, p. 65, kindly sent me from Amsterdam, there is an elaborate article (in English) on this word by J. B. Vinckers, of Kampen, dated Oct. 7, 1882. The author proves, carefully and conclusively, that the derivation which I have given (from Du. wagen) is practically wrong, and that the derivation (from Qu. weeg), which I have rejected, is really the true one. The whole argument turns upon the fact (hitherto unknown to me) that the Du. form wagenschot is an accommodated one, due to a popular etymology which misunderstood a word of which the former half had become obsolete. The E. wainscot is borrowed, as shewn, from Du. wagenschot, in which wagen seemed to mean 'waggon'; but, as a fact, the n has been inserted, and the true old form was waeghe-schot; both of these forms are given by Kilian. But waeghe is from O. Du. waeg, another form of weeg, a wall; see Ten Kate, Aenleiding, ii. 507. Ten Kate not only gives waeg-luis, weeg-luis, a bug, lit. 'wall-louse,' but distinctly points out the origin of the Du. wageschot (as he spells the word). 'Dutch shipwrights (says Herr Vinckers) still use a very remarkable term wageren, meaning "to cover the inside of a ship with boards," from which is derived the pl. noun wageringen, the inside boards, i. e. exactly the wand-schot or wagen-schot of a ship.' He further instances the parallel term seen in A. S. wah-piling, lit. 'wallplanking.' Hence the etymology must be amended accordingly. The Du. wagenschot is a substitution for O. Du. wageschot or rather waegheschot, from O. Du. waeg, a wall, and schot, a wooden covering, panelling of boards. B. The O. Du. wasg is closely related to A. S. wah, a (wooden) wall, also written wag, wag (gen. wages), and Icel. weggr, a wall, whence wegg-pili, wainscoting. These words are con-nected by Fick with  $\checkmark$  WA, to bind; iii. 302. To the same root we may refer E. wattle and Goth. waddjus, a wall, orig. wattled work. y. The above etymology is proved by the existence of a parallel O.Du. form wandschot, from wand, a wall; and it is remarkable that this wand is derived from wand (mod. Du. wond), pt. t. of winden, to wind; from the same notion of wattled work. The whole difficulty arises from the insertion of an unoriginal n, which can be accounted for only as being due to popular etymology, and in no other way. Disguised words of this character are extremely deceptive.

WAIT. Anglo F. wayter, to watch. Langtoft's Chron. i. 448; spelt guaiter, Laws of Will. I. § 28. We find also wayte, sb., a watchman, Lib. Albus, p. 646; spelt gayle, p. 647.

WAIVE. Anglo-F. weyver, weiver ; the pt. t. weyva occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 205, and the pp. weive in the same, p. 55. The outlawry of a female is called weyverie, Lib. Albus, p. 190.

WAKE (2). So also Low G. wake, a hole in ice; Bremen Wörterbuch.

WALLET. It may be noted that the change from watel to walet is analogous to the very common change of M. E. worlde into the curious form wordle, as in P. Plowman, C. i. 10 (footnote), xxi. 136 | in Davies, Supp. Glossary, and in Catholicon Anglicum, note 4.

Hazlitt, vi. 77, we have fadock for faggot. WANION. I have since found that the expression in the waniand is much older than the time of More; for Minot writes: 'It was in the waniand [i.e. in an unlucky hour] that thai come there ;' Polit. Poems, ed. Wright, i. 87. Cf. 'when the mone is wanands;' Reliq. Antiq. i. 52. 'Ealle eorolice lichaman beoo fulran on weaxendum monan bonne on wanigendum;' all earthly bodies are fuller in the waxing than in the waning moon; Pop. Treatises on Science, ed. T. Wright, p. 15. And again, in the York Mysteries, p. 319, Pilate says: 'Nowe walkis in the wanyand, and wende youre way wightely.' WARDEN. Anglo-F. wardein, Gaimar's Chron. 1. 5443 ; Lib.

Albus, p. 247. WARE (1). An early example of M. E. ware is in Layamon, l. 11356. The reference in Bosworth should have been given to § 3 (not § 1) of the Council of Enham, where the acc. scrud-ware occurs, meaning lit. 'shroud-ware,' hence monastic raiment. See Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i. 314. WARRANT. In the Laws of Will. I., we also find the spellings warant, warrant, $$ 45, 47. Cf. also Anglo-F. warrantie, warranty, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 331, spelt garrantie, id. i. 11.

WAYWARD. Compare also: 'His weyes were a-weyward, wrothliche wrout;' Reliq. Antiq. ii. 9; 'Somme [notes of music] kroken a-weyward, als a fleshoke;' id. i. 292. Also a-weyward = Lat. auersus, Trevisa, ii. 25.

WEDLOCK. I am told that the suffix -lác in wed-lác is merely the common suffix of abstract substantives. Cf. Icel. -leikr, Swed. -lek, suffixes used to form abstract sbs.; and cognate with A. S. -lác. Still, the orig. sense of lac was 'present.' We find wedlac used to explain Lat. arrabo, as already noted; also as equivalent to Lat. sponsalia (Leo). In Layamon and the Ormulum, wedlac means matrimony.' WEE. We actually find the spelling wea-bit for way-bit; and it. was, further, actually turned into wee-bit. I think this clinches the etymology. 'In the North parts . . there is a wea-bit to every mile;' Howell, Famil. Letters, iv. 28. It is used also metaphorically. 'I have heard him prefer divers, and very seriously, before himself, who came short a mile and a way-bit; 'Hacket, Life of Williams, i. 59. 'General Leslie, with his Scottish, ran away more than a Yorkshire mile and a Wee bit ;' Fuller, Worthies, Yorkshire (ii. 494). These extracts are from Davies, Supp. Glossary.

WHARF. Earlier examples occur in the Lib. Custumarum, where we find wherf, p. 62, and wodehwarfe, wood-wharf, p. 150. Also warf, Will of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 298. WHELK (1). The pl. welkes occurs in the Lib. Custumarum,

p. 407, l. 9, and in the Lib. Albus, pp. 179, 244, 245, 275, 377, 381. 689. (Never spelt whelkes.)

WHERRY. Spelt whirry, Latimer, Seven Sermons, ed. Arber, p. 170; wherry, Drayton, Seventh Nymphal (Lelipa). 'A whery, cymbe;' Introd. to Speke French, in appendix to Palsgrave (ed. 1852), p. 916, col. 3 (ab. 1530). WHIG. It should be noticed that the explanation of whigamore as 'a great whig' in the Gloss. to Scott's novels is probably a guess ; there being no special sense in the epithet 'great.' It clearly arose from dividing the word as usign-more, whereas (if Burnet be right) it is rather whiggam-or, the suffix being the same as in sail-or and tail-or. WHISKEY. The Gael. uisge, O. Irish uigee, usee, are allied to E. water, from VMAD. See Curtius, j. 308; Fick, i. 766.

WHIST. The game of cards is called which by Taylor the Water-poet, who is said to be the earliest writer to mention it. Nares refers to his Works, ed. 1630; Halliwell to Taylor's Motto, 1622, sig. d 4 (it occurs in Taylor's Works, ed. 1630, p. 54, col. 2). But it makes no difference to the etymology, since which is quite as fit a form as whist for enjoying silence, and indeed agrees more closely with the Swed. hviska, Dan. hviske, to whisper, Norweg. kviska, to whisper; see Whisper. Note also prov. E. whister, to whisper; whish, whist, silent (Halliwell); and see whish, whisht, whist in Nares. Whish occurs in Thomson's Autumn (1730), 1. 524, and in Pope's second Epistle to Mrs. Blount (1715), 1. 24; where modern editions have whist. See the Introduction to 'Cavendish on Whist.'

WHITSUNDAY. The W. name sulgwyn, Whitsuntide, is, literally, 'white sun,' from sul, sun, Sunday, and guyn, white. This name is old, and a mere translation from the E. name at a time when it was still rightly understood. (But experience shews that no arguments will convince those who prefer guess-work to evidence.

The wrong ideas about this word are still persistently cherished.) WHORL. We also find wherve, of which whirl (=whervel) is the diminutive. Moreover, wharrow is a mere variant of wherve. A spider is said to use 'the weight of her owne bodie instead of a wherue;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xi. c. 24. See other examples wygeon by Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 23. Evidently from a variant of F. vigeon, as already said (p. 710). But perhaps F. vigeon is from Lat. uipionem, acc. of uipio, a word used by Pliny, bk. x. c. 49, to mean a kind of small crane. Cf. Ital. vipione, a small crane (Torriano). The laws of letter-change are thus perfectly satisfied, since M. E. wigeon results from Lat. uipionem precisely as E. pigeon does from Lat. pipionem. (Suggested by Mr. H. T. Wharton, who further refers to Salernès, Hist. Nat. des Oiseaux (Paris, 1767),

p. 424.) WINDLASS (2). Wedgwood points out that there is a Low G. windels, a winding, e.g. the winding of a screw or of the ornamental work on a sword hilt, in the Bremen Wörterbuch. If such a form existed in English, it might easily have become windles, windless, windlass. A fuller investigation of the history of the word, and a discovery of more examples of it, would probably settle the question. Palsgrave has: 'Hewar, that fetteth the wyndelesse in huntyng, hueur. WINE. Another theory is that Lat. uinum and Gk. olvos are non-Aryan words, borrowed from Semitic; we find, indeed, Heb. yayin, wine, Arab. waynat, a black grape (Rich. Dict. p. 1660); Æthiopic wein or wain, wine ; Gesenius, 8th ed.

WITTOL. The explanation given is as good as proved by the fact that Bp. Hall spells it witwal. 'Fond wit-wal that wouldst load thy witless head With timely horns, before thy bridal bed;' Sat. i. 7. 17. WONDER. Another example of 'wonders well' = wondrously well, occurs in Udall, Apophthegms of Erasmus, bk. i. Aristippus, § 28. WOOLWARD. Cf. the following: 'Assez sovent lessa le linge, Et si frotta le dos au lange, Rutebuef, ii. 157; cited in Littré, s. v. lange. I.e. 'Very often she left off her linen [chemise], and rubbed her back against her woollen garment.' Le dos au lange is just E. woolward.

WORMWOOD. As to sect. 8, Mr. Palmer points out that Burton, in his Anat. of Melancholy, pt. ii. sec. 4. mem. i. subsec. 3, expressly mentions the use of wormwood in curing madness. So much the better.

WORT (2). The A.S. form occurs. It is not wert, as in Somner, out wyrte. We find man-wyrte (lit. mash-wort), wort, new beer, but wyrte. Cockayne's A.S. Leechdoms, ii. 87, 97, 107; see Mash. This form settles the etymology; for wyrte is clearly from A.S. wyrt, a wort or plant. as already suggested. *WOURALI, OURALI, OORALI, OURARI, CURARI, a resinous substance, extracted from the Strychnos toxifera, used for poisoning arrows, &c. (Guiana). 'The hellish oorali;' Tennyson, In the Children's Hospital, 1. 10. And see Waterton's Wanderings. From 'ourali, written also wourali, urali, urari, curare, &c., according to the pronunciation of the various tribes;' W. H. Brett, Indian Tribes of Guiana, 1868, p. 140.

WRECK. In a glossary of E. law-terms, written in the 13th cent., and printed in Reliq. Antiq. i. 33, we find 'Wree, travure de mer,' i.e. that which is cast up by the sea. This confirms the etymology already given. We find also wrek in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 28, an. 1275

WRINKLE (1). Weigand connects G. runzel with Swed. rynka, but disputes the connection with E. wrinkle. If we admit the former relation, we may as well admit the latter. WRINKLE (2). The word occurs in Lyly, Euphues, ed. Arber, p. 389; and in Latimer, Letter 49, ed. Parker Soc., pp. 421-2.

YACHT. It first occurs (probably) in Evelyn's Diary, Oct. 1, 1661. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

WIDGEON. Perhaps not (F., - Teut.), but (F., -L.). Spelt of \*YAK, the name of an animal. (Thibet.) In a Thibetan Dict. by H. A. Jäschke, p. 668, we are told that the Thibet. word is yrag, a male yak, the female being called po-yyag. The symbol  $\gamma$  is used to denote a peculiar Thibetan sound. YAM. Occurs in 1689; Eng. Garner, vii. 367. YANKEE. We also find Low G. jakkern, to keep walking about, certainly connected with Du. jagen and jackt. Also Norw. janka, to totter, belonging to the same set of words. I have now little doubt that yankee is connected with these words, and not with English nor with Du. Jankin, both obviously guesses, and not good guesses. In his Supplem. Glossary, Davies quotes : ' Proceed in thy story in a direct course, without yawing like a Dutch yanky; Smollett, Sir L. Greaves, ch. iii. Davies explains yanky as meaning 'a species of ship.' I do not know on what authority. If right. it goes to shew that yanky, in this instance, is much the same as yacht. I conclude that yanky or yankee orig. meant 'quick-moving. hence, active, smart, spry, &c.; and that it is from the verb yand, to jerk, which is a nasalised form from Du. and G. jagen, to more quickly, chase, hunt, &c., cf. Icel. jaga, to move to and fro, like a door on its hinges, Swed. jaga, Dan. jags, to chase, hunt. The Dan. jage is a strong verb, with pt. t. jog. The verb to year, meaning 'to jerk,' was carried from the North of England or Scotland to America, where Mr. Buckland heard it used in 1871. and thought 'we ought to introduce it into this country;' quite forgetting where it came. In his Logbook of a Fisherman and Naturalist, 1876, p. 129, he gives the following verses, composed by one Grumbo Cuff.' 'A grasshopper sat on a sweet potato vine, sweet-potato vine, Sweet-potato vine, A big wild turkey came running up behin', And yanked the poor grasshopper Off the sweetpotato vine, The sweet-potato vine.

*YATAGHAN, ATAGHAN, a dagger-like sabre, with doubly curved blade. (Turk.) Spelt ataghan in Byron, Giaour; see note 27. Spelt yataghan or ataghan in F. also. - Turk. yátághán, a yataghan; see Devic, and Pavet de Contrelle, Dict. du Turc Oriental; spelt yátághán, yatághán, Zenker's Dict. pp. 947, 958. YEARN (2), 1. 7. For Rich. II. v. 7. 56 read Rich. II. v. 5. 76.

*YUCCA, a genus of American liliaccous plants. (Caribbean?) 'A root called yucca;' Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 516, l. 1 (1593). The same word as Span. yuca, which in Monlau's Diccionario Etimológico, is said to be a word of Caribbean origin. Mahn says it is the name in the island of Hayti; which comes to the same thing.

*ZAMINDAR, ZEMINDAR, a land holder, occupant of land. (Hind., - Pers.) Hind. zamindár, vernacularly jamindár, corruptly zemindár, an occupant of land, a land-holder; Wilson, Ind. Terms, p. 562. – Pers. zamin, earth, land, soil; dár, holding, possessing, Rich. Dict. pp. 782, 646. Here Pers. zamin is allied to Lat. Aumus, ground; and Pers. dár to Skt. dkri, to hold; see Homage and Firm.

*ZANANA, ZENANA, female apartments. (Hind., - Pers.) Hindustáni zanána, vernacularly janána, incorrectly zenana, the female apartments; sometimes, the females of a family. - Pers. zanán, women, apartments; sometimes, the remains of a family. - Fers. Zanan, women, pl. of zan, a woman. Cognate with Gk. yuri, a woman, and E. guers. H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 564; Rich. Dict. p. 783. ZANY. The Heb. is Yokhanan; the Lord graciously gave; from khainan, to be gracious, to shew mercy (kh = the letter Heth). See I Chron. iii. 15. Yo is put for Yakwek (Jehovah). *ZOUAVE, one of a body of soldiers in the French service, orig.

Arabs, but now Frenchmen in Arab dress. (N. African.) Modern; since the conquest of Algeria by the French in 1830; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. – Arab. (N. African) Zougoug, a tribe of Kabyles living among the Jurjura mountains in Algeria (Mahn, Littré).

<ul> <li>gossip, 1869, p. 227, and by Dr. Morris, in the Academy, April 14, 1883, p. 259. This is, to connect it with M. E. aunter, an adventure; cf. the quotation from Hudibras above. But I repudiate Mr. Blackley's suggestion that the prefixed s is 'intensive,' which explains nothing. The verb to aunter was commonly reflexive; see P. Plowman, C. xxi. 322, xxiii. 175. Hence saunter may be explained from F. s'aventurer, to adventure oneself, to go forth on an adventure; since M. E. aunter = F. aventure. Otherwise, the s. = O. F. es-Lat. ex; so that s-aunter = venture forth. But I repudiate Mr. Blackley's suggestion that the prefixed s is 'intensive,' which explains nothing. The verb to aunter was commonly reflexive; see P. Plowman, C. xxi. 232, xxiii. 175. Hence soumter may be explained from F. s'aventurer, to adventure oneself, to go forth on an adventure; since M. E. aunter = F. aventure. Otherwise, the s. = O. F. es-Lat. ex; so that s-aunter = venture forth.
